

December 2012

Articulating the "L" Word Online: A Study of Chinese Slash Fandom of Super Girl

Jing Zhao

University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

Follow this and additional works at: <https://dc.uwm.edu/etd>

 Part of the Asian Studies Commons, Communication Commons, and the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Studies Commons

Recommended Citation

Zhao, Jing, "Articulating the "L" Word Online: A Study of Chinese Slash Fandom of Super Girl" (2012). Theses and Dissertations. 48.
<https://dc.uwm.edu/etd/48>

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by UWM Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of UWM Digital Commons. For more information, please contact open-access@uwm.edu.

ARTICULATING THE “L” WORD ONLINE: A STUDY OF CHINESE SLASH FANDOM OF SUPER GIRL

by

Jing Zhao

A Thesis Submitted in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree of

Master of Arts in Media Studies

at

The University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

December 2012

ABSTRACT
ARTICULATING THE “L” WORD ONLINE: A STUDY OF CHINESE SLASH FANDOM OF SUPER GIRL

by

Jing Zhao

The University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2012
Under the Supervision of Elana Levine, Ph. D.

This thesis presents a case study of one of the most popular online Chinese fandoms, Fei Se Chao Nv. This online Chinese fan forum is dedicated to slash writings and queer readings of androgynous female celebrities of a sensational Chinese reality TV show, Super Girl. The purpose of this study is to explicate the intricate negotiations between queer and normative cultures within this online, non-mainstream, fannish space. Through a discourse analysis of how the slash fans imagine lesbian relationships, narrate lesbian stories, and queerly gossip about the Super Girl androgynous celebrities in the forum, the study concludes that the fans’ slash practices are frequently complicated by, and struggle with, the normative positioning of lesbian desires, identities, and relationships as deviant in heterocentric Chinese society.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Acknowledgements	iv
Chapter 1: Introduction	1-33
Chapter 2: Lesbian Romances in FSCN Slash Fiction	34-65
Chapter 3: Normativity and Queerness in FSCN Cultural Discourses	66-94
Chapter 4: Conclusion	95-100
Work Cited	101-114

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis would not have been possible without the unflagging support, confidence, and patience of my advisor, Elana Levine. Her encouragement and guidance helped me surmount all the frustrations and uncertainties of the thesis writing journey. I also thank my committee members, Michael Newman and Richard Popp, for their helpful suggestions.

Chapter 1

Introduction

Slash fandom, a subgenre of fan culture focusing on the elaboration of latent romantic and/or sexual relationships between same-sex characters in popular cultural texts, has evolved into a global phenomenon in recent years.¹ With the increasing prevalence of Internet use worldwide, online slash fan culture has been enjoying a growing popularity and diversity. Meanwhile, the formation of international, transnational, and cross-cultural slash fandoms has been greatly accelerated in the age of media convergence and cultural globalization. Although, in both fandom and academia, slash is most often applied to Western fan creations, it is not a new practice for Chinese fans.² Empowered by highly-developed digital tools and web-based communication, Chinese slash fans are able to overcome geographical barriers, reshape global information flows, repurpose popular culture, remake media content, and reassemble and reconstruct materials that are meaningful to them.

Slash has gradually become a significant means for people with marginalized sexual identities and non-mainstream cultural interests to communicate in China. A variety of slash activities thriving online, such as slash fanfic writings and queer readings, offer creative sites of explicit queer-related conversations and productions that are less likely in off-line public spaces. In this sense, the emergence of Chinese slash fandom not only embodies the active role of Chinese fans in cultural participation on a global scale, but also enables the articulation of alternative and potentially subversive voices impermissible within dominant Chinese cultural discourses.

¹ Some Western scholars apply the term “slash” exclusively to erotic fan fiction telling stories about relationships between male media characters. In some cases, another term, “gen,” is used to refer to non-erotic romance fiction around same-gender pairings. In the academic examination of fans’ writing about romantic and sexual relationships between female characters, the term “femslash/femmeslash” is often used. “Girlsplash” is also applied, though less often, in certain studies of queer girl culture. In this thesis, I use the term “slash” to refer to all kinds of fan activities surrounding same-sex fantasies including but not limited to fan discussions, gossip, queer readings, and fantasy constructions surrounding both celebrities and the fictional characters they portray. In some parts of this thesis, I also use “femslash” to differentiate female/female slash fandom from male/male slash fandom.

² Most Chinese fandoms, fan cultures, and related fan activities discussed in this thesis are limited to the fan sites built and dominated by fans located in Mainland China. However, due to the wide accessibility of Chinese fan sites, fans all over the world could consume and/or participate in these fan activities.

What makes online Chinese slash fandom intriguing is the fans' constant negotiation with normative understandings of same-sex desires that are prevalent in off-line, mainstream Chinese society. It should be noted that the objects Chinese fans fantasize about in this kind of fandom are by no means limited to self-identified non-heterosexual celebrities or to queer-themed media. As of 2012, there has been an astonishingly large quantity of slash sites built by Chinese fans for expressing queer desires, constructing queer fantasies, and presenting queer readings of mainstream, heterosexual popular culture.

In this thesis, I present a case study of one of the most popular online Chinese fandoms for slash writings and queer readings of androgynous female celebrities of a sensational Chinese reality TV show, Super Girl (HNTV, 2004-2011. SG hereafter). The highlight of this show is the large number of contestants who look either "boyish" or "androgynous" (Yardley 2005). Like many gay contestants on American Idol, who "have largely kept their [queer] identity under wraps" (Battles 2008), these female contestants on SG have never been willing to talk about their sexual orientations in public. The latent intimate relationships between these contestants, though, are the focal point of its online slash fandoms. My research concentrates on Fei Se Chao Nv (FSCN hereafter), one of the most popular slash fan sites for the show.³ This forum was built in 2006 and is fraught with slash gossip, slash vidding, and slash writings. By the end of May 2012, the forum had more than 460,000 entries and over 3,200 threads. Hundreds of original slash fictions have been circulated on this site, a few of which are more than 300,000 words in length.⁴ In my project, I explore the degree to which FSCN fans' online slash activities challenge the traditional, stereotypical, and heterocentric ideologies of gender roles and sexual orientation rooted in heterosexually-structured Chinese society.

The intricate negotiations between online slash activity and off-line Chinese heterocentric hegemony raise many research questions. Can slash fandom be considered anti-heteronormative and counter-hegemonic in the Chinese context? Or does Chinese slash fandom reproduce the cultural and social hierarchies differentiating the normative from the deviant? Does slash necessarily transgress the mainstream portrayals of heterosexuality and the stereotyping of non-heterosexuality? Will the queer discourses in Chinese slash fandom ultimately promote off-line resistance to the discrimination, isolation, and marginalization of same-sex desires in China?

With these questions in mind, I focus my research on uncovering the ways

³ The fan site referred to is Pink Super Girl Bar (Fei Se Chao Nv), which is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/f?kw=%E7%B3%C9%AB%B3%AC%C5%AE>

⁴ According to Yang & Bao's (2012) research, as of August 2008, there have been 480 complete fan fictions circulated in this forum. However, it is hard to specify the exact number of both complete and incomplete fan fictions posted on this site. Some slash fictions have been deleted by the authors. And some of the fictions were original posted on other slash sites and moved to FSCN later. Zhong Du (Poisoning), for instance, is a slash fiction devoted to the pairings of 2006 SG contestants that used to be posted on another slash site BT Ji Zhong Ying (BT Concentration Camp). A few incomplete fictions in FSCN are also among the most influential ones. For example, one fan fiction published in this forum, Fei Se Shi (Pink Affairs), is more than 300,000 words in length. It is the most popular fiction in the forum. Yet, it is an unfinished story.

FSCN's fans imagine lesbian relationships, narrate lesbian stories, and queerly gossip about female celebrities. My analysis of these online slash activities distinguishes the stances and attitudes of the fans when they imagine fictional lesbian romances from their attitudes toward nonfictional lesbian rumors surrounding the celebrities. In so doing, I argue that, while cultural involvement in online slash fandom temporarily liberates Chinese fans from the gender- and sexuality-related taboos deeply seated in Chinese mainstream culture, their slash activities are not wholly resistant sites. Rather, their online fan practices are frequently complicated by, and struggle with, the normative positioning of lesbian desires, identities, and relationships as deviant in heterocentric Chinese society. The fans' diverse, paradoxical understandings of and perspectives over constructed lesbianism in slash fictions and real-life lesbian identities of both the celebrities and the fans themselves are the epitome of the complex processes in which the fans discursively challenge and negotiate with normative and hegemonic definitions of same-sex desires in traditional Chinese culture.

SG as a Lesbian Spectacle in China

A prominent reality show produced by the Hunan Provincial TV station (HNTV hereafter), SG is an American Idol-style, large-scale, Chinese TV singing contest that only allows female participants. It has become a "media spectacle" (Meng 2009) and has drawn great media and public attention since its premiere in 2004.⁵ In each season, the show starts with a weekly broadcast of the “preliminary selection round” (Hai Xuan in Chinese) which is usually held in five major cities in mainland China. The preliminary audition has no restrictions on the participants’ age, outward appearance, career, singing style, or any other backgrounds. A wide range of Chinese contestants from all over the world have been motivated to participate (Yardley 2005; Lo 2006). In its second season, in 2005, SG attracted about 120,000 participants to audition (Meng 2009, 260) and 400,000,000 viewers in the final round (Yue & Yu 2008, 118).

⁵ Some research states that SG started to become the focus of the public nationwide as of 2005 (e.g., Cui & Lee 2010). Yet, the first season of SG in 2004 achieved regional success in some areas in mainland China, such as Hunan province. This is the main reason why SG attracted 120,000 participants during their preliminary selection rounds in 2005.

Although SG’s selection criteria and processes have been changed frequently and become more and more complicated, the general rule is that whether the contestants can proceed to the next round and eventually win the contest is determined by the responses from three groups of people: several professional judges, a small team of randomly-selected, public judges (Da Zhong Ping Shen in Chinese), and the nationwide audience. While the professional and public judges can vote for the contestants in the live studio after the contestants’ performances, the audience is allowed to vote for its favorite contestants through SMS messages. After several rounds’ selection, the top ten contestants in the regional competitions go to the city Changsha for the national competition. The ranking of the final three contestants in the national competition is solely decided by the audience’s SMS votes (Meng 2009, 260).

SG is certainly not the first reality TV show broadcast in mainland China. However, it is undeniably the most influential and profitable one (Yue & Yu 2008, 118). The cell phone voting of the SG audience has been seen as creating a Chinese form of “democratic entertainment” (Jian & Liu 2009; Xiao 2006) and “the largest voting exercise ever conducted in China” (Yardley 2005). It is also a main venue for the show’s producers to reap profits. In 2005, every single SMS vote cost 0.1 Chinese Yuan (about $0.016 in U.S. dollars). In 2006, the show’s manufacturer raised the price for one vote to 1 Chinese Yuan (about $0.16 in U.S. dollars). Every phone number is allowed to send 15 votes at the most for the same individual contestant in one voting round. In order to better support their own idols, some avid fans purchase multiple cell phone SIM cards and use different phone numbers to vote for the same contestant. It was rumored that, in the final voting round in the 2006 national competition, the audience’s SMS messages brought about more than 20,000,000 Chinese Yuan of profit (about $3,120,000 in U.S. dollars) to HNTV (Sina 2007). The winner of the 2005 SG received 3,500,000 votes during the broadcast of the last episode. In 2006, the winner obtained more than 5,190,000 votes in total in the last voting round (Sina 2007).

As a provincial reality TV show, SG’s spectacular reception and economic success raises the question of what has made so many fans spare no effort in supporting the contestants. The “ordinariness” of the contestants (Turner 2004; Meng Paraphrasing Ouellette & Murray 2009, 258), the authenticity of reality TV (Fiske 2003, 278; Ouellette & Murray 2004, 2), and the unpredictability of a reality TV show’s results (Turner 2004) hardly account for SG’s unprecedented popularity. It has been noted that, thanks to reality TV, “[w]hat constitutes the ordinary in the media ... has been opened up dramatically to offer us multiple versions of class, gender, sexuality and ethnicity” (Turner 2004, 83). In this vein, the success of SG can be at least partially attributed to its potential to offer the audience a ““sudden media exposure of lesbian and gay people’ in prime-time television in China” (French Quoting Kam 2010), though in a subtle way.

Notably, two of the ten 2005 SG contestants who made the final round “obviously challenged traditional gender norms” (Lo 2006, 2). In its third season, in 2006, at least four of the ten finalists exhibited an obvious tomboyish style. In the 2011 national competition, there was even a duo constituted by one feminine girl and one tomboyish girl. They dressed and played as a heterosexual couple when performing songs. Although they insisted that they were cousins, not lesbian lovers, there have been consistent lesbian rumors about their relationship. Since 2005, numerous comments made by the audience and reporters have also stressed the “underlying” lesbian representations on SG. The winner in 2005, Yuchun Li, who has an obvious “baby dyke” (hannahmiller 2009) look, was said to be emblematic of “the growing openness about homosexuality in China” (Lo 2006, 2). Some people believe that most of Li’s fans are young girls who regard her as “their ‘boyfriend’ because of her appearance” (Yardley 2005). The large number of androgynous participants renders SG an implicit lesbian spectacle. This explosion and popularity of androgynous females on the show is not accidental.

Before this surge in popularity of androgynous females in the 2005 SG, most female images in Chinese mainstream media were selected and constructed through the voyeuristic angle of heterosexual males (Yue & Yu 2008). SG, as a new media platform open to a grassroots public, provides underrepresented Chinese females with a chance to voice themselves in varying ways. As noted by Nick Couldry, it is “the fantasy of being included in some way in major cultural forums” that propels the audience to participate in the auditions and/or voting of reality TV shows (2000, 55). The unrestricted preliminary audition and the audience’s voting rights on SG further encourage the participation of those with non-hegemonic gender personas. During its preliminary audition, there are always a great many androgynous contestants. The imperfect voice and nontraditional stage performances of a few of SG’s androgynous contestants, such as Yuchun Li, have provoked a lot of professional criticism. However, their fans’ voting and emotional support often overwhelmed that of other, more conventionally feminine contestants and helped many of these androgynous contestants successfully move toward the final national selection. Through auditioning for the show and/or supporting the androgynous contestants, many females have expressed their great interest in gender and sexual representations that defy traditional, (hetero)normative femininity.

In this project, I look at the continuing struggles and negotiations between mass media images, mainstream ideologies, and femslash culture within a Chinese online, fannish, cultural and social environment. I bridge the cultural, social, and historical shapings of today’s Chinese audiences of diverse gender and sexual identities with their online productions and virtual performances. In so doing, my research reveals the mesmerizing yet perplexing cultural phenomena showcased by one of many online, Chinese, queer spaces devoted to the lesbian connotations of mass media.

Literature Review

My thesis strives to provide a sophisticated understanding of queer-centered subcultures in online fandom. To achieve this goal, I review the ever-evolving scholarly ideas on gender- and sexuality-related issues within slash fandom on a global scale and in Chinese society. By means of reviewing academic literature on these subjects, I attempt to uncover that, although Chinese slash fans have long been categorized as members of non-mainstream groups obsessed with queer-themed activities, they constantly struggle with mainstream, normative culture's constructions of same-sex desires during their online slash activities.

Fandom, Slash, and Cyberspace

Since the late 1980s, scholars have begun to uncover the various ways fans interpret mass media and popular culture (e.g., Bacon-Smith 1992; Fiske 1989; Grossberg 1984; Jenkins 1992; Modleski 1982; Radway 1991; Russ 1985). Most of this early fan scholarship attempts to legitimize the academic value of fan cultures by unveiling the active cultural involvement of socially, culturally, and politically underprivileged publics in media fandom. My thesis further emphasizes the potential of fandom to voice the desires and interests of gender, sexual, and cultural minorities. But, the main focus of my project is to indicate the complexities of fans' repurposing of gender- and sexuality-related information in mainstream entertainment media and popular culture without essentializing the empowering and liberating functions of these intricate meaning-making processes in fandom.

Some scholars have already warned that fandom cannot be simplified as a site of resistance to oppressive mainstream ideologies. John Fiske (1992) has noted the possibility of fans to reconstruct varying degrees and forms of cultural discrimination and social hierarchy within fandom. Henry Jenkins (1992) also notices that fan culture is not a complete departure from dominant, hegemonic culture but an ideological negotiation between fans' own social experiences and the meanings of mainstream media. Likewise, Harry M. Benshoff believes that, rather than sabotaging mainstream ideologies, fan activity, "dramatizes the active counter-hegemonic negotiation of very serious political issues" (1998, 201). Inspired by these studies, my examination of fandom explores the complex ways that Chinese fans negotiate with marginalized queer imaginations and mainstream Chinese conventions in a virtual, non-mainstream social and cultural environment. I do not focus my discussion of Chinese fan culture on its potential for making major changes to current queer politics and cultural conventions in off-line, heterocentric Chinese society. Instead, I argue that Chinese fans' acculturation within heterosexual hegemony rooted in local Chinese conventions complicates the online cultural discourses in which Chinese fans construct their queer fantasies.

Undeniably, it is hard to talk about today's online slash fandoms without mentioning some tremendously influential scholarship on fan activity in the pre-Internet era, such as Henry Jenkins' Textual Poachers: Television Fans and Participatory Culture (1992) and Camille Bacon-Smith's Enterprising Women: Television Fandom and the Creation of Popular Myth (1992). Both studies employ an ethnographic approach to assess fans' active responses to mainstream media texts. Yet, given the limited scope of the studies, neither of them succeeds in offering an examination of dissimilar meanings created amongst diverse groups of fans. While successfully legitimizing fans' active role in cultural consumption, Jenkins' (1992) aca-fan perspective conceives of fan productions as always marginal to canonical media texts and a capitalist media industry. Bacon-Smith (1992) accounts for women's rewriting of popular culture as gender empowerment without considering the differences amongst female fans as variables in her research. Unlike these early studies, my research on online Chinese fandom addresses the significance of the unique social and cultural identities of Chinese fans in online interpretative activity. I argue that the particular social, historical, and cultural shapings of online Chinese fans make their queer interpretations of popular culture distinct processes of cultural negotiation. Therefore, the online rereading activity of today's fans cannot be understood within either dominant/subordinate or empowering/repressive paradigms.

The explosion of online information has brought underground fan cultures to the surface and revolutionized the world of global fans. Francesca Coppa (2006, 54) points out that Internet use among fans has helped popularize a subgenre of fan culture—slash. Still, many Western scholars studied slash activity long before the coming of web-based fandom. According to Constance Penley, the rise of Western slash fandom happened “spontaneously in various places beginning in the early to mid-seventies” (1997, 101). Along with the popularization of slash fanzines, slash fandom attracted more academic attention beginning in the early 1980s.

Some early Western fan studies claimed that slash fandom was primarily comprised of heterosexual women who were exclusively interested in fictional male/male intimate relationships (e.g., Bacon-Smith 1992; Jenkins 1992; Jenkins 1994; Penley 1992), and gave little attention to the racial, ethnic, and national differences within fandom (e.g., Bacon-Smith 1992; Fiske 1992). Of course, this viewpoint is no longer upheld by most fan scholars. In recent years, a few Western scholars interested in femslash fandom have emphasized the popularity, significance, and potential of female/female bondings and pairings in the productions of female fans of a diversity of sexual orientations (e.g., Hamming 2001; Lothian & Busse & Reid 2007; Ng 2008; Russo 2002; Russo 2009). Yet, the failure of this body of literature to consider non-Western possibilities in femslash fandom has not been sufficiently questioned.

My project adds to this dialogue around femslash fandom by introducing the existence of online international femslash fandoms. I do not mean to claim that all the fans engaged in the FSCN forum or other Chinese femslash fandoms are self-identified lesbian or bisexual females. Yet, I employ the concept of queerness in this research to denote all kinds of non-heterosexual cultural interests, identifications, positions, and sexual desires. In turn, I argue that all the fans actively involved in slash fandom are looking at mainstream entertainment media and popular culture from a non-heterosexual perspective. Consequently, slash fans can be defined as queers whose participation and experience in popular culture transcend rigid borders of gender and sexual identity.

Gender and Sexuality in Slash Fandom

Even in an age when online slash is unprecedentedly popular among fans worldwide, academic work on femslash culture remains rare in comparison to the studies of male/male slash. In male/male slash studies, gender and sexual identity are always the center of attention. Most of the early Western scholarship concerning slash culture attempted to explain the essential reasons for heterosexual women to be enthusiastically engaged in slash fanfic writing and queer readings. For example, Joanna Russ sees slash fan fiction about homoerotic relationships between men written by women as “feminist pornography” (1985). Patricia Frazer Lamb and Diane Veith (1986) further argue that male/male slash stories fundamentally exemplify heterosexual women’s desires for gender equality within heterosexual relationships. Constance Penley (1991), while not denying the subversive potential of slash writing to create and circulate unconventional gender roles, emphasizes the function of slash writing in “creating pleasures found lacking in original products” (139). According to Penley’s (1992) psychoanalytical approach, slash writing and reading offer heterosexual women entry points for self-identification with the male characters in the stories. Furthermore, she contends that erotic slash writing could be understood as a “project of retooling masculinity itself” (Penley 1997, 101). In this sense, the representation of same-gender sexual intimacy in slash fiction does not necessarily signify an aspiration for homosexuality (Penley 1992, 487). These understandings of gender and sexuality in previous slash scholarship have been challenged by newer theories of queerness in slash fandom.

More recent studies illustrate that slash fandom should not be studied solely as a gendered space (e.g., Reid 2009; Sandvoss 2005) or as a restricted, homoerotic environment while denying the diversity and fluidity of the sexual identities of its participants (e.g., Busse & Lothian 2009; Jones 2002; Kohnen 2008). Robin Anne Reid (2009) proposes that the focus of slash studies should move from debates over the heterosexuality/homosexuality and masculinity/femininity binarisms to an emphasis on the ongoing negotiation of queerness and normativity exemplified in fan productions. According to Reid's understanding, much previous slash scholarship tries to universalize slash activity as akin to traditional feminine genres and thereby to align slash narratives with romance fictions that embody "the conventions of romance plots, domestic settings, and the ideal of egalitarian relationships" (2009, 467). Reid (2009) criticizes this way to look at slash for ignoring the potential of slash fandom, especially online slash fandom, to destabilize fixed categories of gender and sexuality.

Some studies of queer media, spectators, and culture have also broadened the approach of slash scholarship to queer theories (e.g. Doty 1993; Driver 2006; Kohnen 2008). It has been argued that fans' reinterpretation and repurposing of non-heterosexual connotations of popular culture articulate not only the expressions of self-identified sexual minorities but also the responses from "all other potential (and potentially unclassifiable) nonstraight positions" (Doty 1993, xvi). This kind of queer reading activity, in Doty's term, should be identified as "a mass culture reception practice" (1993, 2). Echoing Doty's suggestions, Melanie E.S. Kohnen (2008) suggests a spectatorial position, "seeing queerly," to distinguish active experiences of queer viewing from fixed categories of queer identity. She proposes that TV fans should be recognized as spectators and studied through "an approach that indicate[s] a move beyond the hetero-homosexual binary” (Kohnen 2008, 210).

Following this definition of queerness in media audience studies, I continue this debate by arguing that slash activity and normative understandings of gender and sexuality are not mutually exclusive in certain online fan communities. Through identifying normative elements of FSCN slash culture, I further contend that slash writings and queer readings in online Chinese slash fandom do not guarantee an anti-normative and counter-hegemonic virtual queer utopia.

Normativity, Hegemony, and Queerness in Slash Fandom

Many academic studies on Western fan cultures frame slash fans as resistant to heteronormativity (e.g., Benschhoff 1998, 201; Hayward 2000, 309; Rambukkana 2007). Certain slash cultures are believed to offer an anti-heteronormative queer diaspora (e.g., Bury 2005; Busse & Lothian 2009; Hanmer 2010; Lipton 2008; Reid 2009). Nevertheless, the potential of slash activity to empower gender and sexual minorities needs to be further questioned, as slash itself does not essentially trouble mainstream, heterocentric norms.

Some research has revealed that slash fans often incorporate the cultural assumptions and conventions of gender, sexuality, and human relations imposed within a specific cultural context into their own fannish activities (e.g., Berger 2010; Jenkins 1992; Kreisinger 2012; Ng 2008; Woledge 2005). Other studies demonstrate that slash fans sometimes privilege certain normative sexualities and identities over others (Lothian 2008; Ng 2008; Woledge 2006), restrict their own queer performances and preferences to virtual realities (Busse 2006), and appropriate “abnormal” contexts to play out their queer fantasies and identities (Benshoff 1998; Doty 1993; Jones 2002; Lothian & Busse & Reid 2007).

Additionally, plenty of scholarship on queer studies demonstrates that queers are extremely subject to mainstream, conventional ideas about queer identities and inclined to gain legitimacy through performing in conformity with heterosexist frames of homosexuality (e.g., Dyer 2006; Gross 2001; Gross 2003; Jeppesen 2010). In view of this normative tendency in queer culture, my project examines whether FSCN slash fans inevitably assimilate and reproduce heteronormative and oppressive views about non-heterosexual identities and relationships in their online activities.

In particular, based upon her own slash writing experiences, Susanne Jung (2004) contends that slash fan fiction is a grassroots means of troubling the binarisms of gender, sexuality, and heterosexual hegemony rooted in dominant culture. Jung's slash fiction posits the main characters' homo-relationships in fantastic worlds without gender-related dichotomies. As she (2004) asserts, it is a critical way of writing to play with conventional tropes of gender and sexuality. In my project, I pay particular attention to this "alternate reality (AR)" mode of slash fiction and gossip. This type of slash narrative is a repositioning of the characters into cultural and social contexts that are "already queered" (Benshoff 1998, 215; Doty 1993, 15; Jones 2002; Ng 2008, 104; Woledge 2005).⁶ In these culturally distant settings, homophobia or sexual orientations "may be ... meaningless concep[ts]" (Green & Jenkins & Jenkins 1998, 22). Bearing on these points, my analysis of FSCN slash narratives seeks to reveal that some Chinese slash fans use Western worlds or other historical/futuristic contexts as queer fantasy contexts in slash narratives to normalize fictional lesbianism.

⁶ Certain genres, such as gothic, horror, and cult, are frequently appropriated in AR narratives.

Asian BL/GL Manga Cultures

Studies on Asian slash culture have been divided into smaller and interrelated subfields. One of the most popular Asian slash genres that has been given the most academic attention is boys' love (BL) manga.⁷ Manga, a popular art form that originally started in Japan, is "akin to an American comic book or comic strip" (Perper & Cornog 2002, 4). BL manga (BL hereafter) fandom is devoted to the writing and consumption of fictional homoerotic stories about male characters. Some unique characteristics of BL stories have been identified to distinguish BL from Western slash or gay literature. For example, due to the influence of transgenderism in Japan (Wood 2006; McLelland 2000b), the images of males in BL are usually very feminized (McLelland 2000b, 13-14).

Some research sees BL as media "created by and for women" (Wood 2006, 394), an embodiment of "voyeurism" (Ogi 2001), and a site for females to play an active role in the imagination of sexual intimacy (Fujimoto 1991). My project does not intend to interrogate these views of BL in current scholarship. Instead, admitting that the purpose and object of BL fandom are quite different from those of the fandom that are analyzed in my project, I build my research on some relevant points drawn from BL studies.

⁷ Terms, such as "BL," "boys' love," and "boy-love" have been applied to this kind of manga fandom in China.

A few scholars have recognized that there are some similarities between BL and Western slash cultures (e.g., Jenkins 1992; McLelland 2000a; Wood 2006). Andrea Wood (2006) points out that the global consumption of BL and Western male/male slash productions reflect women's frustration with mainstream, heterocentric culture worldwide. Also, many BL fictions narrate stories within culturally distant contexts. This anti-realism of BL narratives has been marked by a body of literature (e.g., Allison 1996; Aoyama 1988; Buckley 1991; Kinsella 1998; Li 2009; Wei 2008). As Wei Wei (2008) describes, "The [BL] stories are all set in an 'other' place, like Europe; the boys [in BL] are also depicted as the 'other', at least non-Japanese" (2008, 2). This narrative pattern resembles the escapist AR/AU slash mode in Western slash writing. Some scholars believe that it shows a disinterest of BL female fans in contemporary, real-world, queer-related issues (e.g., McLelland 2000b). However, by showing a similar yet more contradictory tactic in FSCN femslash writing to distance homoerotic narratives from the social realities of mainstream Chinese society, my project argues that this mode of slash narratives actually relies upon the fan writers' own frustrations with the mainstream denying, othering, and excluding of lesbianism in the nonfictional world.

Research has been dedicated to the discussion of normative notions of gender and sexuality within BL fandom. Mark McLelland (2000a) points out that yaoi, a subgenre of BL presenting stories with "the slenderest of pretexts for getting the male stars of popular television dramas into bed together" (2000a, 277), is characterized by elements of S/M and sometime reproduces patriarchal tropes of power differences in its construction of sexual intimacy between two male characters. Nonetheless, it has been argued that the gendered roles and relationships depicted in BL are fluid and performative (Li 2009, 53; Wood 2006). Some research also claims that BL provides a possible site of resistance to heteronormative discourses and a playground to trouble fixed categories of gender and sexuality (McLelland 2000b; Welker 2006, 843; Wood 2006). Bearing on these arguments, I investigate the cultural implications of the sexual relationships portrayed in FSCN femslash narratives with regard to non-heterosexual females' identities and desires. Dissimilar to these findings in BL scholarship, I argue that the lesbian sexual intimacy in slash literature can be read as a result of the reconciliation of fannish, queer imaginations of mainstream images and normative, patriarchal cultures' constructions of gender and sexuality.

Along with the rapid development of the online transnational fandom of BL, more attention has been given to cross-cultural interpretations of this fan subculture. While there remains little academic literature dedicated to both regional and global girls' love (GL) manga fandom, some scholars believe that fans' lesbian desires can be encouraged and liberated during writing and consuming BL.⁸ In particular, Wood terms American cross-cultural fandom of Japanese BL “a global counterpublic that is both subversive and fundamentally queer in nature” (2006, 396). She argues that the queerness of BL does not just lie in its depictions of the romantic and sexual relationships between men but also is demonstrated by the fact that BL queers the ways its female fans consume and experience sexual fantasies (2006, 397). More importantly, Wood asserts that the graphic portrayal of androgynous, beautiful boys in BL not only transgresses established gender and sexual categories but also reflects “lesbian desir[es] being encoded within th[e] characters” (2006, 399). Similarly, James Welker (2006) describes BL as offering a possible space for fans to free their lesbian desires. Further, examining BL from a cross-cultural perspective, he finds that the Western elements in BL “help to liberate writers and readers to work within and against the [Japanese] local heteronormative paradigm in the exploration of [gender and sexual] alternatives” (Welker 2006, 841). My project follows Welker’s argument to probe how the West is “borrowed” by FSCN fans to voice their queer desires. Different from Welker’s conclusion, I argue that Chinese local heterocentric hegemony inevitably complicates FSCN fans’ imagining of the West as a queer utopia.

⁸ Terms, such as “GL,” “girls' love,” and “girl-love” have been applied to this kind of manga fandom in China. Little scholarship has been devoted to Chinese local and cross-cultural GL fandom. According to Yang and Bao's research, this is because GL is often seen as “a female version” and a subcategory of BL (2012, 3).

A body of academic literature has expressed interests in online Chinese fandom of BL (e.g., Li 2009; Wei 2008). In her research on Chinese female fans of BL, Yannan Li points out that some female fans are interested in reversing the portrayed binary dominant/passive sex roles in BL stories.⁹ However, Li’s survey of Chinese female BL fans also shows that Chinese women’s appreciation of BL has no “direct relation ... [to] their attitudes towards LGBT group [in reality]” (Li 2009, 61-62). Besides, Chinese female fans are inclined to clearly differentiate their real life from their fantasies in BL fandom (Li 2009, 62). These findings appear similar to the results of other research on Chinese BL fandom that “some female BL readers only accept homosexuality in the fictional world rather than in their everyday lives” (Yang & Bao Paraphrasing Li 2012, 3). Yet, Li does not go further to contend that they are demonstrative of Chinese BL fans’ internalization of the dominant pathologizing of same-sex desires (2009). Unlike Li’s study, Wei’s research on Chinese female BL fans reveals fans’ self-awareness of the “problematic” nature of their obsessions with BL (2008, 20-21). Also, Wei confirms the existence of “hegemonic discourses” in Chinese BL fandom by uncovering the fact that some Chinese fans “mock and rearticulate the hegemonic gender norms in their fan writings” (Wei 2008, 22).

⁹ In some research, this binarism of sex roles in erotic relationships depicted in BL stories is also said to be top/bottom or initiator/receiver (gong/shou in Chinese).

To test these findings in BL fan studies on Chinese femslash fandom, my project looks at FSCN activity, such as queer gossip and discussions, for normative and hegemonic elements of sexualities and identities. I explore whether FSCN fans replicate the struggles to detach their online queer fantasies from the nonfictional, real world, and the extent to which they try to separate their slash identities and activity from both online and off-line mainstream social spaces.

SG* as Reality TV and Its Fan Cultures

The online femslash fandom of SG has not been adequately discussed in academia. Yet, SG has been frequently studied as the most successful reality talent show in China. Witnessing the rise of SG grassroots fan communities since 2005, a few scholars have concentrated their work on the power relationships between the show and its fans. Most of the scholarship gives disproportionate attention to the democratic discourses of SG and its fandoms, emphasizing the false empowerment of fans, and downplaying the queer aspects of the show and its fandom (e.g., Cui & Lee 2010; Keane 2007; Meng 2009). Almost all of these discussions are built on Western research on reality TV.

Along with the global popularity of idol-manufacturing reality TV, such as Pop Idol in Britain, American Idol in the U.S., and a myriad of similar shows in other European and Asian countries, Western academic debates over the reasons for this formula's worldwide success are common. Some studies find that the "discourse of the real" (Ouellette & Murray 2004, 2; Fiske 2003, 278), the "ordinariness" and "authenticity" (Holmes 2004, 157), and the illusionary, empowering fantasy (Couldry 2000) of this kind of show are what attract the eyeballs of the general public. Especially for the audiences of singing contest reality shows, "[a]lthough the music performer may well be associated with a particular genre, style, and screen persona (In terms of the music video, for example), there is arguably a greater degree of blurring between on-stage and off-stage persona given that they are not literally playing a fictional role" (Holmes 2004, 152-153). In this light, it is the "real" essence of reality TV that in part makes reality singing contest shows unprecedentedly successful all over the world.

Others believe that the "reality" in reality TV "is constructed solely in order to produce a representation" of certain identities of grassroots publics that have not been emphasized enough in mass media (Turner 2004, 62). In this vein, it is the grassroots, cultural and media representations in reality TV that are the most appealing part. These representations are made through the processes of selecting and producing stars from the general public. This characteristic of reality TV is said to be extremely significant for deprived groups, such as people of lower social status (e.g., Couldry 2000; Turner 2004). Also, as Richard Dyer has articulated, stars function as cultural signs for the audience and can be interpreted in terms of gender and sexuality (1986, 1998). In this sense, the celebrities manufactured by reality shows that greatly contribute to the representations of gender and sexual minorities on TV might obtain overwhelming support and welcome from an audience whose interests and identities are underrepresented and repressed in both media and the physical world.

Based on this viewpoint, my project further addresses the unique and complex way in which Chinese fans support, protect, and queerly read and fantasize about the androgynous SG celebrities. By analyzing the queer potential of the show and the slash productions and fan discourse on FSCN, I show that the popularity of some androgynous female celebrities among FSCN fans results from both SG producers' implicit queer exploitation of the androgyny of the participants and the fans' queer articulation of these lesbian connotations of the show.

Furthermore, in contrast to the research emphasizing the “real” aspect of reality TV, my study highlights that, for some FSCN fans, SG celebrities are still “fictional truths” (Nadalianis 2002, xv). They remain fictional media characters who can only play constructed, non-heterosexual roles in the fans' online queer gossip and imaginations. My project shows that, different from celebrity gossip, rumor, or tabloids that aim to “shar[e] social judgments” (Turner 2004, 107), “integrat[e] celebrities ... into one's everyday life” (Turner 2004, 107), or “purpor[t] to tell the truth” (Busse 2006, 214), queer gossip on FSCN remains a form of imaginative, slash activity. It is strictly separated from the celebrities' real life by the fans and only limited to the fans' virtual spaces. Based upon my analysis of FSCN fan discourse, I argue that this distinctive characteristic of FSCN slash activity reflects the intertwined influences of off-line normative culture, repression of queer sexuality in mainstream fan sites, and the cultural and sexual discrimination and othering within the virtual queer space of FSCN.

It is worthwhile to mention that, in recent years, there have been several studies focusing on SG fans' appreciation of the androgyny of some SG celebrities. In one study concentrating on the non-mainstream gender performance of the 2005 winner of SG, Yuchun Li, her androgynous persona is marked as "female masculinity" by Audrey Yue and Haiqing Yu (2008). Yue and Yu (2008) see the popularity of Li's tomboyish look as a new wave of feminism in China. While they believe that Li's androgyny challenges traditional Chinese gender ideals, her fans' conflict over queer-related topics is left unexplored. Although, as Yue & Yu (2008) have shown, Li's female fans bravely express their love and support for her, these same-sex desires are more frequently expressed through discourses of women's friendship and social bonds.

The most recent scholarly analysis of SG fandom provided by Ling Yang and Hongwei Bao (2012) suggests examining SG non-mainstream fan sites through a queer lens.¹⁰ This groundbreaking research on Chinese femslash is particularly relevant here, as I present a study of the same SG slash forum in this thesis. Through an ethnographic study of FSCN, Yang and Bao (2012) contend that SG slash fandom allows for a creative virtual space that is constructive to queer women's bonding and disruptive to Chinese heterosexual hegemony. I do agree that slash activity in this forum affords a site of queer desiring voices that is less likely in any off-line public spaces in China. Nonetheless, my analysis of FSCN queer gossip and cultural discourse seeks to problematize the optimistic view of FSCN as a queer-supportive place for emancipating and empowering Chinese women of all kinds of gender, sexual, and cultural identities. I contend that the intrusion of both online and off-line normative Chinese ideologies into online slash activity should not be ignored. Thus, a review of the academic literature on queer-related cultures, information flows, and politics in China is particularly pertinent.

¹⁰ In their study, Yang and Bao equate online SG femslash culture with GL culture, which is closely related to Japanese media. However, given that a large portion of GL culture exclusively centers on the lesbian relationships between under-age, feminine girls, I see a difference between GL culture and SG slash culture in China.

Queerness from a Chinese Perspective

Despite the fact that Chinese society has always been sexually conservative and heterocentric, there was a neutral and tolerant attitude toward male homosexuality in ancient Chinese culture as long as same-sex relationships were not challenging the established status quo (Chou 2001; Hinsch 1990; Wu 2003; Zhang 2009). However, some early studies of modern Chinese queer culture showed that most Chinese people believed that there were no homosexual people in ancient Chinese society at all (e.g., Hinsch 1990; Wan 2001). In his research published more than two decades ago, Bret Hinsch stated that the native homosexual tradition in ancient China, which lasted for several hundred years at least, was unknown among not only "critics of homosexuality" but also non-heterosexual people themselves in contemporary China (1990, 171). This false perception was widely accepted among modern Chinese people because the definition of and the knowledge regarding non-heterosexuality in contemporary Chinese society has been greatly shaped by Western influences.

As a body of scholarship reveals, due to the oppressiveness of traditional Chinese Confucian ideology and Communist politics, queer voices, especially lesbian desires, used to be silenced in modern China until the late 1970s (e.g., Farrer 2002; Jeffreys 2006). Since 1979, the Chinese government's opening-up policy to the outside world, especially toward the West, has "led to an influx of all kinds of publications and other materials from overseas" (Wan 2001, 49). Correspondingly, it also brought about an enhanced access for Chinese people to Western information about queer movements (Wan 2001). Many concepts related to queer activism commonly used by non-heterosexual people in today's mainland China were adopted from the West (Chou 2001; Hinsch 1990; Zhang 2009).

As some scholars argue, in the context of heterosexually-structured societies, non-mainstream sexualities and desires can turn out to be a serious threat to the ideologically-normalized heterosexuality in these heterocentric worlds (e.g., Cohen 1999; Gross 2001). Expressions and causes related to Chinese queerness, in consequence, undoubtedly touch on the Chinese government's "political sensitivity" (Wan 2001, 56). The Chinese government believes that the ever-increasing queer visibility on the Internet and in mass media could expose a broader range of Chinese people to this assumed rebellious culture. As a result, both queer representations in mainstream media and queer communication online are severely censored in China.

A lot of research reveals that mainstream media and official literary records in contemporary China rarely mention queerness or refer to it in a positive way (e.g., Gross 2003, 267; Wan 2001, 49; Zhang 2009, 10). Entertainment media images and representations of queer people in mainland China are also constantly distorted and related to moral aberration and corruption (Chou 2001; Zhang 2009). Although, in recent years, some Chinese independent lesbian movies have been produced, they have never been officially released to the general public in mainland China but only appeared at foreign film festivals (Chen & Chen 2007, 116). While scholarly research has been done on queerness in China, little of the literature particularly mentions lesbianism (Chen & Chen 2007, 118).

Also, some Western scholars claim that the freedom and anonymity provided by virtual spaces not only protect queers from being discriminated against for their minority sexualities in the off-line world but also help them effectively gain access to all aspects of queer culture, construct queer identity, and find emotional support on a global scale (e.g., Amberson 2008; Barnhurst 2007, Berry & Martin 2000, Gross 2001, Gross 2003). This sanguine way to investigate online global queer culture hardly captures the discriminatory and normative aspects of slash activity in cyberspace. My project brings a different perspective into the analysis of queer virtual spaces. By showing FSCN fans' contradictory construction and understanding of lesbianism in slash activity, I ultimately suggest that online slash fandom can be perceived as a creative space for queer performances but not as a queer utopia without discrimination and marginalization.

Throughout my project, I introduce a more complicated phenomenon than previous scholarship on slash culture has suggested. The increasingly popular online slash activity in China cannot be simplified as the equivalent of Western slash or BL/GL cultures. Online Chinese slash fandom affords a space to study the intersecting of gender, sexuality, nationality, fan culture, and globalization in a larger transnational context. Accordingly, my research emphasizes the significance of recognizing the invisible, normative, stereotypical perspectives about same-sex desires in Chinese slash culture.

Method

In examining this online fan culture, I employ discourse analysis to examine the slash activities of the FSCN forum. Some previous research claims that the majority of the fans involved in SG fandoms, in FSCN, or even in Chinese BL/GL fandoms at large are young, highly-educated females in China (e.g., Yue & Yu 2008; Yang & Bao 2012). Yet, I do not completely agree with this point. As some Western literature on online queer communication has already argued, it is difficult to find out the off-line, real identities of the online participants in that virtual identities are often performative and fictional (Busse 2006; Hanmer 2010). Besides, based upon my own observation of FSCN forum, there exist slash fans who self-claim to be male or very young and thus less educated. According to FSCN participants' own, online, alleged locations in the physical world, Chinese fans from all over the world can also be found in this slash fandom. In addition, some of the fans are even homophobic or unfriendly to self-identified lesbians. Therefore, my research cannot accurately specify the demographics of the participants of FSCN slash activity. Instead, I see the diversity, mobility, and performativity of the fans' online gender, sexual, and cultural interests and identities as fluid elements of the cultural discourse within virtual fandom. Using discourse analysis, my project shows how these intriguing characteristics of SG fans further render its online slash fandom a convoluted cultural arena.

My analysis focuses on the online discourses in which FSCN fans negotiate with local normative cultures within online, non-mainstream social and cultural spaces. I seek to reveal how complex discourses regarding gender and sexuality play out within this slash fandom. By presenting discourse analyses of both slash narratives and general fan discourse on FSCN, my research accounts for the intricate social and cultural struggles that have transformed Chinese slash culture in an Internet age. To start with, I investigate in what way FSCN fans posit lesbian characters and work out lesbian relationships in fictional slash narratives. Then, I explore the cultural discourse in which the fans negotiate with mainstream ideologies, normative stances, and queer desires. I pay attention to how the real-world lesbian topics including nonfictional lesbian rumors about some androgynous SG celebrities are dealt with by FSCN fans.

Fiske points out that discourse is always “a social product” (1996, 4), “a terrain of struggle” (1996, 5), and a meaning-making and re-circulating process (1996, 6). As he elaborates, discourse is “language in social use; language accented with its history of domination, subordination, and resistance; language marked by the social conditions of its use and its users: it is politicized, power-bearing language employed to extend or defend the interests of its discursive community” (Fiske 1996, 3). Thus, an analysis of discourse is the best way to reveal the interests of a community and the power relationships embedded in it. Michel Foucault also concurs that discourse is where “power and knowledge are joined together” (1990, 100). Seen in this light, discourse is not just a means to disseminate information but, more importantly, a process of promoting certain kinds of power and knowledge.

Certainly, Fiske’s and Foucault’s accounts of discourse are limited to Western societies. Yet, these points can explain why discourse analysis is a proper way to examine the processes in which online Chinese sexual and cultural minorities create meanings out of mainstream information and redistribute these meanings in virtual spaces. In today’s virtual environment, the expressions and circulations of discursive, non-mainstream desires of certain local areas become more complex than ever before. These voices of struggles are constantly shaped and inevitably restrained by local social realities, national cultural identities, and global imaginings. Thus, it is necessary to study these complicated discourses in which the groups of people marginalized by dominant discourses fight to promote their own voices but simultaneously conform to certain repressive ideas that keep othering, rejecting, and silencing their own cultures. The slash narratives and queer gossip created and circulated within online Chinese fandom are not just imaginative texts but discursive practices that reflect the complexities of the social and cultural shapings of queer popular culture in contemporary China. An exploration of cultural discourses within online Chinese slash fandom offers insights into the understanding of how queer knowledge is presented, consumed, appropriated, and discursively constructed under the influence of a wide array of dominant and subordinated powers.

There has been a body of Western scholarship theorizing gender and sexuality as discursive formations. For instance, as Adrienne Rich states, heterosexuality is not a personal choice or sexual preference but “a political institution” that aims to oppress all women (1986, 313). Rather than defining sexuality as a personal attribute, Foucault (1990) understands sexuality as a cultural production and challenges the fixed categorization of sexual identities. Judith Butler echoes this problematization of the naturalizing of certain categories of gender and sexuality by arguing that “[gender] identity is performatively constituted by the very ‘expressions’ that are said to be its results. ... [It should be considered] an ongoing discursive practice...[that] open[s] to intervention and resignification” (1990, 25-33). Moreover, Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick argues that queer identity should be seen as “a strategy for the production of meaning and being” (1993, 11). In this vein, my project on FSCN cultural discourse uncovers how Chinese dominant, heterocentric ideologies are interwoven with the fans’ reconfiguration of gender and sexuality in queer imaginative spaces.

By viewing mediated figures as discursive constructs of already-existing multiple discourses, Fiske has employed discourse analysis to show how dominant cultural and political discourses are reworked and re-presented in popular culture (1996). Take, for example, the TV show Murphy Brown (CBS, 1988-1998). In Fiske’s terms, it served as “a discursive relay station” that assimilated, reproduced, and re-circulated the preexisting conventions of family values (1996, 24). I follow this way of understanding popular culture by applying Fiske's theory to my own discourse analysis of FSCN forum. My research conceives online slash activity as a discourse event in Chinese popular culture. I see both fictional characters and real celebrities being fantasized about in Chinese slash fandom as mediated figures that reflect subordinated fan groups' struggles within dominant cultural discourses. My analysis seeks to detail the ways Chinese slash fans queerly imagine and discuss these mediated figures. Based upon my discourse analysis, I maintain that these queer meaning-making processes in online slash fandom are where dominant cultural values and subordinated voices fight for power.

Chapter Breakdown

There are four chapters in my project. In the following two chapters, I present my discourse analysis of FSCN forum.

In Chapter 2, I focus my analysis on the imaginary lesbianism in FSCN slash fictions that is partially drawn from the intentionally "queered" content of SG. Firstly, I analyze the media and cultural discourses around SG itself, revealing the queer potential of SG that is exploited by its producers and later articulated by its slash fans. Moreover, by analyzing some FSCN fictions about the lesbian romances of SG celebrities, I examine how the fans queerly narrate fictional stories about these Chinese celebrities. I pay close attention to the ways FSCN fans appropriate certain heterosexual gender-role patterns and culturally distant settings to construct lesbianism in slash fictions. I elucidate that these characteristics of FSCN slash writing are representative of the cultural contestations between the fans' queer desires, mainstream images, normative hegemony, and the repressive realities of Chinese society.

In Chapter 3, I concentrate my analysis on the general, fannish cultural discourse that embodies the ways FSCN fans queerly read SG celebrities as constructed, media figures yet simultaneously struggle with and resist nonfictional lesbian implications surrounding both the celebrities and the fans themselves. Firstly, by introducing the intricate identity discourse of SG slash fans in cyberspace, I uncover the different ways the fans express their desiring voices for the SG androgynous celebrities in mainstream and slash fandoms. In so doing, I reveal how FSCN functions as an online closet for some SG queer fans to express their non-mainstream desires while maintaining normative identities within online mainstream environments. Moreover, I show how real-world lesbian topics are downplayed and/or eliminated by FSCN fans during queer gossip. By means of this, I demonstrate that FSCN is not an uncontested, queer utopia. Rather, it is fraught with conflicts and struggles between queer and normative cultures.

The last chapter is the concluding part of my project. In this chapter, I summarize all the findings and arguments engendered through my examination of FSCN fandom. Also, I talk about the cultural significance and implications of my research on online Chinese slash fandom. Finally, I provide suggestions about further research directions, possibilities, and methods in the field of Chinese slash study.

Chapter 2

Lesbian Romances in FSCN Slash Fiction

The explosion of online fans' queer readings, writings, and discussions about the romantic and sexual relationships of celebrities and the characters they portray in media is hard to ignore. A few researchers have attributed the rise in popularity of online slash activity worldwide to the potential of virtual slash fandom to allow fans to express their subversive voices and to obtain self-esteem and senses of belonging (e.g., Hanmer 2010; Yang & Bao 2012). Yet, online slash activity is not a simple matter of resisting mainstream culture and empowering underprivileged groups. Instead, it is an active site that is fueled by fans' tangled, contradictory desires: to explore queer connotations of the primary text, to unfetter the restraints of normative realities, and to legitimate their slash activity within mainstream, social and cultural environments. Thus, the assumed renegade potential of online slash fandom for the self-empowerment of gender, sexual, and cultural minorities is worth sophisticated examinations. In contrast to the optimistic view of online slash fandom as a non-hegemonic, anti-normative, utopian site, my project sees it as a location for negotiating fictional queer desires, the hegemony and normativity of gender and sexuality, and the repressive realities of gender and sexual politics.

There has been a proliferation of online Chinese femslash sites for expressing queer desires and conveying alternative interests in media and cultural representations of lesbianism. The FSCN forum devoted to the 2006 SG contestants is an excellent example in this regard. In this chapter, I center my analysis on FSCN slash fiction.

Firstly, I introduce the implicit queer discourse of SG articulated by its online slash fans on FSCN. Furthermore, I critically examine the ways the fans narrate lesbian romances about the androgynous 2006 SG contestants. Using a few influential FSCN slash stories devoted to some popular SG contestants as examples, I explore the cultural discourses of fannish, fictional lesbian fantasies in which the prevailing textual maneuvers of the fan fictions can be interpreted as the fans' struggling with mainstream media discourses, normative Chinese culture, and oppressive realities while constructing fictional lesbian fantasies. In so doing, I strive to explain how and why FSCN fans prefer to employ certain gender-role patterns and culturally distant settings to construct lesbianism in their fictional narratives.

My findings ultimately indicate that, although Chinese fans indulge their non-mainstream craving for queer fantasies online, their slash writing is fraught with contradictions. Rather than an outright queer challenge to heteronormativity or an escapist, queer fantasy genre, FSCN fiction is an intricate embodiment of the fans' articulations of queer fantasies, their compliance with patriarchal and normative assumptions of lesbianism as derivative to and imitative of traditional heterosexual relationships, and their struggle to narrate fictional lesbian romances within the current, repressive Chinese context.

The “Queered” SG and Its Online Slash Fandom FSCN

As I have briefly implied in chapter 1, SG producers' queer exploitation of its contestants perpetuates its fans' androgyny mania. As Jenkins (1992) says, “there is already some degree of compatibility between the ideological construction of the text and the ideological commitments of the fans” (34). SG’s acceptance and highly visible profiling of androgynous contestants is likely a discursive tactic of its producers to promote, dramatize, and sensationalize the show. As argued by Graeme Turner, while the major goal of reality TV is to make a profit, celebrities created by the shows are just “profitable by-product[s]” (2004, 54). Reality TV always looks for people who can “project a personality on television” and who “are more usefully ordinary than others” (Bonner 2003, 53). SG contestants’ androgyny, in this sense, unexpectedly became a “useful,” profitable thing to explore. Seeing business opportunities from the audience’s supportive of and even fanatic reactions to these androgynous females, the producers have highlighted the androgyny of the contestants and have queerly paired some androgynous contestants to deliberately make news and create strong public interest.

For example, Yuchun Li has an obvious tomboyish voice, personality, and look. During the competition, she always wore manly shirts and loose jeans. During the national competition, Li was asked to perform a love song for heterosexual couples, You Are the Most Precious (Ni Zui Zhen Gui in Chinese), with her “best friend” Liangying Zhang, who is a traditionally feminine, curvaceous girl. In the beginning of the song, Li and Zhang were holding each other’s hands like a couple. With an ambiguous tone, Li said to the audience, “Please support my friend Liangying Zhang, because her voice is as beautiful as her figure.” This queer pairing of Li and Zhang on the show greatly encouraged the emergence of YuLiang slash fans online.¹¹

¹¹ YuLiang refers to the first names of Yuchun Li and Liangying Zhang.

Likewise, the show often divides its contestants into two groups in terms of their gender performances. Teams of professional clothes designers and make-up artists are hired by the show to help the contestants with their outfits and personal appearance. While the androgynous ones are required to cut their hair shorter and wear boyish costumes, the feminine ones usually have long hair and wear traditional skirts. During the course of the competition, each tomboyish contestant is frequently “coupled” with a feminine one to perform a song or to live in the same hotel room.

Moreover, the producers often queerly exploit the real-life, off-screen relationships between the androgynous contestants and their female friends. The contestants’ female friends are frequently invited to the live studio and performing with the contestants in varying intimate ways on the show. For instance, before participating in the singing competition, the 2006 winner Wenjie Shang used to be an office lady who worked in a foreign company in Shanghai. Her boss is a beautiful, elegant, young woman who showed up at the scene of the show multiple times, and was invited to talk about Shang on the show and even rumored to live with Shang. During Shang’s regional competition, her boss was sitting under the stage to support Shang. At the moment when Shang started to sing, her boss was given a long close-up showing that she was so moved by Shang’s performance that she almost burst into tears. Besides, a few popular androgynous contestants, such as Liyang Liu, are allowed to invite their female friends who have a very noticeable tomboyish style to be interviewed on-stage during the live broadcast.

In addition, there are many quite dramatic relationships presented on the show.

Take, for example, the bittersweet friendship exhibited between two very popular contestants from 2006, Liyang Liu and Wenjie Shang. Both of them made the final round of the competition that year. Shang went on to win the contest, and Liu was second runner-up. They had become friends and shared a hotel room since the preliminary selection round; however, they needed to compete ruthlessly against each other in the final round. This kind of “performed” bittersweet friendship between the contestants is not uncommon on SG. The constructed, intense homosocial bonds throughout the course of the competition also existed between other androgynous contestants, such as Yuchun Li and Jie He in 2005, Bichang Zhou and Yali Huang in 2005, and Fei Xu and Na Li in 2006.

Through these “designed” homosocial plots, not only the androgynous personas of some contestants but also the intimate relationships between the contestants are further “queered.” Certainly, the show’s producers have never acknowledged that they intend to create any homosocial bonds between SG contestants. In fact, sometimes when the homosocial performances of the contestants overstep, the producers call them off. In one episode of the 2009 national competition, one androgynous contestant, Yike Zeng, was forced to compete with her “best friend,” Chen Pan, who is a traditionally feminine girl. During the competition, neither of them was willing to see the other being eliminated. When the public judges were voting for their performances, Pan, the more sentimental one, could not stop crying. In order to comfort her, Zeng kissed Pan on her lips for several seconds during the live broadcast. Realizing that this kissing scene was too “Brokeback (Duan Bei in Chinese)” (QQ 2009), the producers immediately switched the broadcast to commercials to cover it up. Yet, many audience members present in the live studio recorded the scene and posted it online. There was also a lot of media coverage given to this SG “lesbian” kiss afterwards. Of course, these unconventional gender and sexual performances can also be said to be the contestants’ own choices. Yet, after the show ended, some of the most popular androgynous contestants have turned back to their feminine, “normal” looks. In view of this, some cynical fans have speculated that the androgynous personas of many SG contestants were just a special kind of “publicity gimmick” (Chao Zuo in Chinese) to attract the attention and participation of the public (e.g., xuxiaoduo77 2009).

These complex cultural and media discourses not only have shaped SG into an implicitly “queered” media form but also have given rise to its staggeringly large numbers of online slash fandoms. Numerous slash fan sites devoted to this show have been built since 2005. Since 2006, slash writings and queer gossip about the SG contestants have flooded Chinese cyberspace. Because of its wide-ranging focus on multiple pairings in the 2006 SG, FSCN became one of the most prominent SG slash forums. It was built in May 2006 by a slash fan of the 2005 SG androgynous celebrities (Yang & Bao 2012, 9). The fans on FSCN have never explicitly declared that the site is designed for slash activity about SG contestants. But its name, Fei Se Chao Nv, literally means “sex scandals” between SG contestants and thereby discloses the queer essence of all the fan activities on it. The most remarkable aspect of the FSCN forum is its staggeringly large quantity of threads devoted to original slash fanfic creation and queer gossip about the “sex scandals” of SG pairings.

Slash Writing on FSCN

It is hard to determine why an outburst of original slash fanfic writing started on FSCN in 2006 and carried on into 2010. Yet, some Western fan scholars have shown that fans use slash activity to expand and explore the underlying world hinted at by mainstream media (e.g., Bacon-Smith 1992, 45; Jenkins 1992, 176). By queerly constructing and intensifying the friendships between females, SG discursively manufactures some of its androgynous contestants as “on-screen” queer hybrids that imply “the way that gender bending and non-normative sexualities can denaturalize and transgress” rigid gender and sexuality divisions (Friedman 1998, 77). According to some research (e.g., Yang & Bao 2012), FSCN fans are well-aware of the flood of quasi-homo relationships on SG as a manipulation by SG producers to dramatize the competition. Yet, they take advantage of the queer meanings of the show to create their own versions of lesbian romances. Slash writing is a major way for the fans to celebrate these queer hybrids and elaborate the underlying queer world suggested by SG. The majority of the slash stories on the forum are centered on the already-established, homosocial bonds between certain androgynous SG celebrities in the primary text and exclusively confined to queerly transforming these on-screen pairings into fictional homoerotic relationships.

There are many different ways to categorize slash fanfic genres on FSCN. While “sweet literature” (Tian Wen in Chinese) features lesbian romances with relaxing storylines and happy endings; “torturing literature” (Nue Wen in Chinese) has a great resemblance to Western dark romance that is full of dramatic, intense plots. Also, the fans categorize stories without explicit erotic depictions as “clean water literature” (Qing Shui Wen in Chinese). The ones with heavy portrayals of sexual intimacy are classified as “H literature” (H Wen in Chinese).¹² Moreover, the stories that do not situate the paired characters within the contexts of SG but relocate them in other, distant, fictional settings are named Jia Kong literature.¹³

There is a tradition of FSCN slash writers to designate the pairing in the title of the thread where the story is posted. For instance, some stories focusing on the pairing of two androgynous contestants, Fei Xu and Na Li, are marked as FeiXue (F/X hereafter).¹⁴ The ones about the pairing of Liyang Liu and Wenjie Shang are usually marked as YangShang (Y/S hereafter) literature.¹⁵ Most FSCN slash fictions are devoted to the two most popular pairings: F/X and Y/S. This may be explained by the high profile of their relationships as exhibited on the show. The fans often refer to these pairings promoted by SG as “official couplings” (Guan Pei in Chinese). Since the show presented a more dramatic, intense relationship between Liu and Shang than the one between Xu and Li, fiction about the coupling of Liu and Shang is predominant.

The order of the names of the characters in the title often discloses a Gong/Shou (initiator/receiver) division in the pairing. The binarism of Gong/Shou roles in homo-pairings are borrowed from Japanese BL culture to refer to binary sex roles in ¹² The use of H is based upon a Japanese word “hentai” and it means erotica (Yang 2010).

¹³ Jia Kong is a word directly borrowed from Japanese language. In Chinese, it is used to refer to the act to create fictive worlds in media. Thus, I do not translate it into English here.

¹⁴ Xue refers to the nickname of Li, Xiaoxue.

¹⁵ Yang is used to refer to Liu’s first name, Liyang.

slash narratives. The pairing of Y/S, for example, implies that Liu is the dominant one in their lesbian relationship, while Shang is the passive one. To the contrary, S/Y stories depict Shang as the initiator and Liu as the receiver.

As Yang and Bao observe, “the change of sex roles in the pairing is not unusual” (2012, 11). Indeed, there are many FSCN stories that invert the sex roles of the characters. The fan readers also seem to be excited to see this kind of story. S/Y stories are not hard to find on FSCN. A few fictions marked as both Y/S and S/Y allow Liu and Shang to switch their dominant/passive roles. Some fictions are marked as chaotic couplings (Luan Pei or Luan CP in Chinese). In this genre, more unlikely, nontraditional pairings, such as romances between two tomboyish characters, can be constructed. The writers of the chaotic couplings genre usually narrate multiple lesbian relationships for the same character, which enables that character to change her sex roles in her different romances.

FSCN slash writing not only articulates the queer aspect of SG but also highlights the fluid and performative natures of gender and sexuality by allowing the characters to play unfixed sex roles in lesbian romantic/sexual relationships. In the process of exploring gender and sexuality variations in diverse kinds of FSCN fictions, the naturalized divisions of gender and sexuality in heterosexual hegemony are demystified and challenged. Nonetheless, slash narratives do not necessarily guarantee a radical break with normative culture (Jenkins 1992; Ng 2008). For instance, FSCN fans’ lesbian portrayals often draw on the normative positioning of androgynous females and lesbian relationships as emulations of “patriarchally heterosexualized” gender identities and relations (Doty 1993, 82). This tendency of FSCN slash writing renders its lesbian romances mixed representations of queer and normative interpretations of non-heterosexual females’ desires and identities.

Heteronormalized Lesbianism in FSCN Slash Fiction

Much of FSCN slash fiction shows a blending of a queer challenge to heterocentric and patriarchal hegemony and a normative view of lesbianism as an imitation of heterosexuality. Although the writers attempt to portray non-hegemonic sexual expressions and transgressive gender performances, they often simplify butch/femme identities to a masculine/feminine division and rebuild a gendered power difference within the lesbian pairings. This contradictory construction of lesbianism divulges the fans’ struggle between their queer imaginations and mainstream, normative culture.

A Case Study of FSS

The long Y/S novel Fei Se Shi (FSS hereafter), known for its explicit portrayals of the intimate relationship between Liu and Shang, is the most sensational story on FSCN. It was originally posted on FSCN in November 2006 by one very active SG slash writer Clockwork Orange 521 (CO521 hereafter).¹⁶ After five years, the FSS thread had more than 10,000 responses. Even now, nearly six years later, there still are many fan readers discussing and commenting on it online.

FSS portrays an incestuous relationship between Liu and Shang over 18 years.

In this nontraditional story, the two are depicted as half-sisters sharing the same

¹⁶ The author’s user name is Fa Tiao Cheng 521 in Chinese. CO521 has written both male/male slash and femslash fictions.

biological father. Yet, their parents kept this truth from them. When the two were 12 years old, Shang's mother got remarried to Liu's father. Since then, Liu and Shang were brought up together as step-sisters and had special feelings for each other. After they have grown up and experienced untold sufferings, the two decide to face their feelings and live together as a lesbian couple. Shortly after that, they discover their biological relation. Full of remorse, Shang runs away from Liu without a word, eventually settling down with a fake identity in Tibet. Meanwhile, Liu starts off on her journey to look for Shang. In the sequel to FSS, Liu and Shang eventually reunite and get back together in a heaven-like place in Tibet.¹⁷

As a slash fiction, FSS is queer in essence. By depicting an incestuous, lesbian love story between two persons who can't stop loving each other even after their biological sisterhood is revealed, it throws the alleged legitimacy of heterosexuality in mainstream culture into crisis. However, some hegemonic and normative concepts of gender and sexuality continue to undergird the lesbian relationship in FSS. For instance, Shang's femme lesbian identity is constructed through a normative imagining of traditional femininity. Shang's non-hegemonic androgyny in her adolescence is dealt with as an immature, passing phase, while her heterosexually feminine, curvaceous outward appearance after she grows up is depicted as a sign of her transition into being an attractive, mature, femme lesbian. This normative modifying of lesbian identities and relationships is best revealed by the sexual violence in FSS.

¹⁷ FSS has an incomplete "sequel" (Fan Wai in Chinese). Due to some unclear reason, the author, CO521, stopped writing it in early 2007 and claimed that there was only one more chapter to be written.

As a classic H and torturing fiction on FSCN, FSS is fraught with a large number of erotic scenes and plots of S/M, rape, and sexual violence between the two characters. A corpus of literature argues that representations of sexual violence in multiple media can be seen as a romantic element to explore the sexual tension between pleasure and danger (Caudill 2003, 35; Levine 2007, 224; Palmer 1999, 118). As Tania Modleski points out, “[t]he rapist mentality” in romance rape scenes is sexual desire “disguised as the intention to dominate and hurt” (1984, 35). In slash fiction, in particular, rape and S/M sex scenes can be categorized as extreme cases of the hurt/comfort genre that tend to reveal the emotional closeness and the physical attraction between the characters (Bacon-Smith 1992, 262). As Helen Caudill elaborates, the sexual tension is what “the TV show hints and that the [slash] fan fiction inhabits and explores” (2003, 38). The violent scenes in slash fictions can help the characters’ “attraction, love and sexual need for each other to be expressed openly. And in turn, that expression transforms the threat of sexual violence into consensual lovemaking” (Caudill 2003, 35). I do not disagree with these ideas. In fact, there are many other FSCN fictions featuring the sexually violent scenes between Liu and Shang, such as another very famous Y/S story, No Angel (Shi Jin Er Yao A 2008). The intense, “bittersweet” relationship between Liu and Shang in the final competition may encourage the fans’ preference for these “torturing,” violent plots. The explicit portrayal of sexual violence in the fictions can be considered a writing strategy to erotically explore the homosocial tension between Liu and Shang. Yet, the explicitly erotic and sexually violent scenes in FSS also present an unequal relationship within the imagined lesbian romance, which epitomizes the complexities of FSCN slash writing as a location for both a queer subverting of heterosexuality and a normative recasting of patriarchally-defined gender relations within fictional lesbianism.

Through the portrayal of this violent sexual relationship, the author reproduces a gender hierarchy within lesbian relationships. In the depictions of erotic moments between the two characters, Shang is portrayed to be a virgin who is always sexually passive, submissive, and awkward; while Liu is an experienced, aggressive, butch-identity lesbian due to her sexual promiscuity over the years. In the rape and S/M scenes, Shang, as the receiver in this lesbian relationship, is forcibly seduced, tortured, tied up, and/or raped. Certainly, these violent plots are not driven by hostility. Instead, in the process, both of the characters' erotic fulfillment and gratification are infused with mixed feelings of despair, guilt, shame, and self-destruction. It is the violent sex that makes the complex emotions of the two so vividly presented to the reader. However, as Foucault says, as a sex game, S/M "is a strategic relation, because it is always fluid.... [T]here are roles [in S/M], but ... those roles can be reversed" (Macey citing Foucault 1993, 368). Not only does the reversing of roles in sexual violence barely happen in FSS, but also the violent sex between the two always works as a way for the initiator Liu to release intense emotions. As a result, Liu's sexual dominance and power is reinforced while the passive sex role played by Shang is constantly repressed and treated as inferior.

The most famous rape scene between the two characters happens right after Liu misunderstands Shang's ambiguous friendship with her boss. Liu's outright penetration in the rape scene is an ultimate symbol that exerts her sexual power over Shang. Likewise, the S/M scene happens after Liu finds out about their biological relation. The dominant, abusive role Liu takes in the sexual degradation of Shang expresses her great frustration with their incestuous relationship. After the sexual abuse, Liu breaks up with Shang. Although she is not depicted as taking pleasure in humiliating and abusing Shang, she does not take the initiative to comfort Shang's pain, either. On the contrary, Shang blames herself for their break-up. In order to attract Liu's attention and get back with Liu, she tries every means to heterosexually feminize herself, such as extending her hair, and wearing skirts and high heels.

Some BL scholars claim that it is a heterosexist understanding of gender that equates being penetrated with disempowerment and feminization (e.g., Wood 2006). Nonetheless, the aggressive sex scenes in FSS help the initiator gain a sense of control and security by actualizing the initiator's aggressive sexual power over the receiver. The passive one in this sexual relationship is not only disempowered and traditionally feminized but also subordinated and silenced. Rather than presenting an egalitarian love that achieves mutuality on an emotional level, the sexual violence in FSS shows a heteronormative reconstruction of lesbian romance that emulates male primacy and female subordination in heterosexual relationships. This part of the story is misogynist and heterosexist and eventually mainstreams a gender hierarchy of the heterocentric world in imagined lesbian romances. It casts doubt on the potential of slash writing to overturn the disempowered positions of women and sexual minorities in normative, patriarchal Chinese society. This contradictory way to construct lesbianism also exists in some fictions reversing the sex roles in the pairing.

The Sex Roles in FSCN Fiction

Some studies believe that the reversing of sex roles in slash fictions showcases a transgressing of rigid dominant/passive identity constructs (e.g., Wood 2006). Yet, most of the time, the transgressiveness of FSCN slash writing is temporary. The fans deem the switching of the sex roles of the two characters in one pairing as a form of “Fan Pu” (Push him/her over in turn). This term refers to the passive partner actively initiating sex with the dominant one. Rather than an identity that fundamentally defies conventionally-constructed gendered roles and power relations, it is a fleeting moment designed for erotic excitement.

There are some FSCN writers of the S/Y genre attempting to switch the dominant/passive roles assigned to the pairing of Liu and Shang. Take, for example, the S/Y story, Lure into Surrender (Jiao Shen Me Dou Shi Cuo 2009a).¹⁸ Shang is depicted as an androgynous police officer who is independent, decisive, and brave. Her character seems to be more androgynous than traditionally feminine. The author promises that, rather than a temporary Fan Pu, this story allows Shang to become an “authentic” initiator in their relationship (Jiao Shen Me Dou Shi Cuo 2009b). Nonetheless, a heterosexually-framed lesbian relationship and a traditional gender demarcation are still central to the pairing in this fiction.

Shang is portrayed to own many characteristics associated with traditional femininity, such as being tender, nurturing, caring, and domestic. The tomboyish one in their relationship, Liu, is an aggressive, defiant, cynical womanizer who is attracted to very feminine women. Both of the two used to have plenty of female casual sexual partners and did not treat relationships seriously. This positioning of lesbian females transcends the rigid barriers between male masculinity and female femininity. And the sexually permissive attitude of both characters contravenes the traditional, passive role of females in sexual relationships assigned by patriarchal culture. But the only difference between Shang and Liu in terms of their permissiveness is that Shang used to be a lonely, affectionate person who looked for emotional comfort while Liu was a sexually aggressive, attractive player who was only interested in sex and treated sexual partners like garbage. In this way, the sexual attitude of the feminine one in the lesbian relationship is automatically relegated to the realm of emotional need, while the permissiveness of the tomboyish one is attributed to her masculinized sex drive.

¹⁸ The Chinese Title of this fiction is You Xiang.

The story gives more detailed portrayals of Liu's promiscuous relationships with multiple, feminine women than Shang's. While portraying the butch lesbian as sexually active and aggressive troubles a heteronormative gender binary, addressing her heartless role and promiscuous behavior in sexual relationships actually reveals a disempowering, subordinating, and victimizing of the feminine in lesbian romances. In contrast, the author's intended dominant role for Shang is thinly shown through a vague, short description of the only sexual encounter between the two characters. Their first kiss is initiated by Liu. The actual lesbian sex is not explicitly described but is revealed by Liu's recall the next morning when the author unmask their reversed sex roles by having Liu handcuffed to the bed. Contradictory to what the writer promised, the changing of sex roles and the subverting of the power inequality in this lesbian romance remain transient.

This fiction defiantly rejects heterosexual-dominant society by portraying a lesbian utopia where heterosexual relationships and characters become marginal. The nontraditional gender and sexual identities of the two characters and the fluidity of the sex roles the two play during sexual intimacy are disruptive to normative culture. Yet, most parts of the story recasts heterosexual sex-role patterns and gender stereotypes within lesbian sexual relationships. The linking of the sexual performances and attitudes of butch/femme lesbians with the hegemonic conventions of masculinity/femininity implies a normative understanding of “butch-as-heterosexualized male and femme-as-heterosexualized female” (Doty 1993, 89). In this way, the fiction tends to consider butch lesbian as “a substitute for ... the opposite gender” and to express queerness through a “heterosexualized cross-gender identification” (Doty 1993, 82-89).

It is true that writing and reading fictional lesbian romances are only ways for the fans to express and experience queer fantasies. Both heterosexual romance researchers and authors argue that romance readers can tell the difference between reality and fantasy (e.g., Krentz 1992; Phillips 1992). Hence, the writers and readers of these fannish stories are not necessarily desirous of lesbianism that reproduces heterosexual gender hierarchy and stereotypes. Romance fictions have been said to only “offe[r] readers an escape from reality” (Phillips 1992, 54; Parameswaran 2002). Yet, even if these lesbian romantic fictions do function as a pure escape for the fans, the preference of the fans for lesbian stories featuring normative and hegemonic elements is still problematic.

These contradictory constructions of fictional lesbianism in FSCN slash stories can be ascribed to the fans' own conflicting understandings of lesbian desires, identities, and relationships that are shaped by and negotiated with normative culture's construction of heteronormalized lesbianism. The contradiction might partially result from the ways SG formulates its androgynous contestants and their homosocial relationships. For example, throughout the course of competition, while Liu often cross-dressed as a male and perform songs for men on the stage, Shang was allowed to show her effeminate side and sing soft, women's songs. Although both Liu and Shang generally have an androgynous appearance, SG often framed their relationship in a heterosexual way. In the final competition round, for instance, they were asked to wear Chinese red silk costumes. While Liu's dress resembled a man's suit; Shang's dress was better tailored to accentuate the curves of her figure. When they stood next to each other singing, some fans joked that they looked like a heterosexual couple wearing traditional Chinese wedding dress. As argued by Dyer, "casting gay relationships and characters in terms of heterosexual sex roles" is a means to legitimate dominant culture by stereotyping subordinated people (2006, 356). SG's heteronormalizing of androgynous identities and homosocial bonds, therefore, upholds heterosexual hegemony while sensationalizing this show. FSCN fans may uncritically internalize this normative framing and further apply it to their own slash narratives.

Also, Janice Radway explains that “[t]he romantic fantasy is ... not a fantasy about discovering a uniquely interesting life partner, but a ritual wish to be cared for, loved, and validated in a particular way” (1991, 83). In this respect, the integrating of normative and hegemonic elements into lesbian romances may reflect the fans’ struggles to realize queer fantasies in a patriarchal, heterocentric cultural context. While queerly interpreting mainstream culture within such a male- and heterosexual-dominant society, the fans might feel compelled to “defend” and “normalize” lesbian fantasies by incorporating certain stereotypes of gender and sexuality into slash narratives. Thus, the contradictory imaginings of fictional lesbianism that challenge the status of centralized heterosexuality yet heteronormalize lesbian relationships and mimic heterosexual gender inequality, are the writers’ reconciliation, either consciously or unconsciously, of normative culture and their queer explorations of mainstream images. This paradoxical situation of the fans queerly reading a heterocentric, patriarchal culture can be better demonstrated by the use of culturally distant settings in the Jia Kong slash genre.

Marginalized Lesbianism in Jia Kong Literature

Most stories on FSCN are Jia Kong stories. Due to the final, cruel competition between the contestants presented on the show, slash fans seem committed to using the Jia Kong genre to break the constraints of the canon and reclaim the homoerotic connotations of the pairings in distinctive settings. Jia Kong slash helps remove the characters from SG, a media world very close to reality, and reassigns these reality TV characters to alternative occupations and identities in other fictional contexts. It allows the writers to draw heavily on a variety of genre elements, such as crime, fantasy, historical, or science fiction.

By recasting the two characters in non-canonical contexts, Chinese Jia Kong literature runs parallel to a subset of Western slash fiction, “alternate universe” (AU hereafter).¹⁹ The culturally distant settings in AU fiction, such as futuristic, historical, or fantasy contexts, remove the social and cultural pressures that must be dealt with in current realities and thereby offer slash writers great freedom for the exploration of queer possibilities (e.g., Penley 1991; Woledge 2005). Yet, this intentional distancing of lesbian romances from reality does not simply signify a “homoindifferent” (Woledge 2006) attitude of the fan writers. As Benshoff has pointed out, there is an oppressive tendency to link “queer sexuality with monstrosity” in the fandom of gothic soap opera (1998, 105). Although I do not mean to criticize a similar AU slash mode in FSCN Jia Kong literature for its intentional denigration and othering of lesbianism, I believe that it does represent a discursive response of the fans to the repressive reality in real-world, contemporary China. Often, this frustration of the fans with mainstream culture is encoded within relocated narrative settings of Jia Kong literature. In this way, the fans show an unease about the existence of non-heterosexual desires, identities, and relationships in the contemporary, heterocentric Chinese world. Thus, this AU setting in FSCN literature is a sophisticated writing tactic to realize queer fantasies and question heterocentric, patriarchal culture while evading being directly confronted with the oppressive reality of mainstream society.

¹⁹ In some research, it is also called alternate reality or alternative world (AR or AW).

Western Plotlines

Jia Kong stories on FSCN often show a tendency to borrow Western contexts to complete the development of lesbian romances, especially in the stories devoted to the pairing of Liu and Shang. This strategy is similar to a mode of Western slash fiction that utilizes “the homosocial worlds of ancient Greece and Persia” to create environments in favor of homoerotic relationships (Woledge 2006, 101). The appearance of Western storylines in Jia Kong slash narratives is always paired with some entry or turning points for their lesbian romantic and sexual relationships. For instance, in FSS, the first lesbian kiss between Liu and Shang takes place in France. By positing the two characters in a culturally distant, foreign place, the author intensifies their emotional bonding and, thus, accelerates the development of their lesbian-erotic relationship. Even in some Jia Kong fiction in which the development of the lesbian romance is not relocated abroad, it is often the case that at least one of the partners is imagined as having lived in a Western country earlier in her life. In these stories, the lived experiences of the characters in the west often serve as backgrounds that foreshadow their lesbian romances in China.

Sometimes, the West is also used as a queer diaspora for non-heterosexual Chinese people to run away from the social pressures or the suffering resulting from their lesbian desires. In the plots of many Jia Kong stories, the romantic relationship of Liu and Shang starts in China, but is doomed to fail eventually because of social pressure. Then, one or both of them go to a Western country, such as England, France, Greece, Italy, Canada, or Australia, to recover from the psychological trauma. The plot then finds them either reuniting overseas and resuming their love affair after they return to China, or meeting by chance in the West, where they settle as a happy lesbian couple. Even in the stories without a happy ending between the two characters, Western settings still function in a therapeutic way. Take, for example, the fiction Plane Tree (Chou Chang Liao Wu Yi 2009).²⁰ In this story, realizing there is no future for her secret lesbian love for Liu, Shang runs away and eventually settles down in Australia, a place with similar scenery to where she met Liu for the first time. This Australian plot offers Shang a space that not only separates her from the current, disappointing realities in China but also allows her to reminisce about her lesbian past.

It is possible that these international storylines were inspired by the personal experiences of Liu and Shang that have been promoted on the show. They both studied in European countries and can speak multiple Western languages fluently. Shang is a French-major college graduate, while Liu finished her undergraduate study in England.²¹ Western places with predominant French- and English-speaking populations are frequently employed as the settings in Jia Kong literature. However, the fact that in Jia Kong slash, Western worlds positively perpetuate lesbian desires and are the destinations of choice for non-heterosexual people, is hardly just a direct borrowing from the real-life narrative. Rather, it can be seen as a strategy of the writers to create fantasies that are less acceptable in mainstream Chinese culture and society.

²⁰ The Chinese title of this fiction is Xuan Ling.

²¹ As a prestigious Chinese University graduate with major in French, Shang was said to have a good command of English, French, and German. Liu received her Bachelor degree in Advertising from a famous college in England. These foreign experiences may also explain why England and France are more frequently used as cultural settings in slash stories than other Western countries. However, the foreign backgrounds of the two cannot fully account for the prevailing appropriation of the West as a homosocial or queer-positive environment in Chinese slash fandom.

Notably, a great many Jia Kong fictions prefer to position other SG celebrities in Western settings, such as Liangying Zhang in Love Wrong, Wrong Love! (Na Bi forever 2007), Na Li in Shadow Gloom (Feng Lai Feng Qu Yu Wu Hen 2007), and Jiaqing Wei in Every Lonely Flower (Fei Yang Yi Xia 2007). Most of these celebrities have never been abroad and/or cannot speak foreign languages at all in real life. Besides, in the following entries of one Y/S Jia Kong story with Western plots, Love Likes the Tides (Ma Li Lian. Xiong Yong 2009a), some fans wondered why the story is set in Quebec, such an unfamiliar place to Chinese fans.²² The author responded in this way, “Quebec is the largest, French-speaking province in Canada. It is chosen [to be used in the story] is because same-sex couples can legally get married there. As a YSER (Slash fans of Y/S), we believe it represents hope” (Ma Li Lian. Xiong Yong 2009b). As can be seen from this explanation, the West, deemed as a queer-supportive world to which fans aspire, not only becomes an ideal, fantasy universe for the creation and development of fictional lesbian romances, but also helps the fans validate lesbianism that is impossible, repressed, marginalized, and denigrated in the current Chinese cultural context.

This romanticization of the West as a queer wonderland in slash writing is a result of complex contestations between the fans’ queer desires and Chinese hegemonic assumptions of the West and non-heterosexuality. On the one hand, it reflects a Chinese Jia Kong slash trope that same-sex desires are more prevalent and easily developed in Western countries and are more acceptable to people who have Western cultural backgrounds and lived experiences. The west in the fans' fantasy scenarios is culturally, politically, and socially positioned as the opposite of mainstream Chinese society to express, develop, and reminisce about same-sex desires.

²² The Chinese title of this story is Ai Ru Chao Shui.

This deployment might be well-explained by an Occidentalist perspective in current Chinese society that “the plentiful and prosperous Western materials civilization and its culture are considered superior to Oriental culture [by some Chinese people]; ... the Western world is a heaven [to them]. [These Chinese people] seek an opportunity to pay respects to it or enjoy themselves there” (Ning 1997, 64). The erasing of queer history and representation in local Chinese media and the influx of Western queer-related information into mainland China have helped form a positive conceptual linkage of queerness with the West among Chinese people. Consequently, a valorization of a Western queer world “which is perceived as non-homophobic, care-free, and liberating” is prevalent in China (Chou 2001, 31). Especially in recent years, the blooming of media piracy in mainland China has familiarized Chinese audiences with a diversity of Western media, including queer-themed American TV shows such as Queer as Folk and The L Word (e.g., Tan 2011; Yang & Bao 2012). These queer images in Western media further promote an unrealistic queer imagining of the West among most Chinese audiences, who have no access to the real, off-screen Western worlds. Seen in this light, underlying this promotion of the valorized queer atmosphere of the West is the “backward” intolerance of mainstream Chinese society toward non-heterosexuality (Engebretsen 2008, 99). The fans’ utopian, queer imagining of the West essentially reflects their self-consciousness of mainstream Chinese society as an exclusive, heterocentric place. Even in fictional narrative, the fans tend to emancipate lesbian characters by creating a queer utopia freed from constraints of Chinese heterosexual hegemony. This narrative strategy, therefore, ultimately expresses a pessimistic view about the Chinese social and cultural realities of same-sex relationships and non-heterosexual people in the nonfictional, physical world.

On the other hand, this queer exploration of the West also suggests a tendency to use Western places and lived experiences to “naturalize” the lesbian romances between Chinese characters. The contextual naturalization of lesbianism discloses the fans’ compliance with one Chinese heterocentric assumption of lesbianism as a derivative, unnatural, and culturally shaped sexuality from the West (Engebretsen 2008).

In a recent study of Chinese fans’ interpretation of the American TV show Friends, See Kam Tan (2011, 221) recognizes that a “‘we-us-Chinese-self’ versus ‘they-them-Westerners-other’” dichotomy is created in Chinese audiences’ cross-cultural interpretations of sex- and homosexuality-related themes. Tan’s (2011, 222) study exhibits that some Chinese fans possess distorted, homophobic views of homosexuality as a “contagious disease,” a “‘learned’ behavior,” and a prevalent thing in the West. According to Tan (2011, 219), the represented life on American TV is nontraditional, sexually permissive, and unreal in terms of Chinese local realities. Thus, the mixed influences of Chinese people's self-consciousness of a unique "cultural group that had particular traditions, norms, and values ... the recourse to cultural difference based on ignorance and denial," and the unfamiliar life portrayed on American TV lead to "gross generalizations of the culture of the other" among Chinese fans (2011, 221). These views of non-heterosexuality in mainstream Chinese society as derivative and deviant are frequently incorporated into FSCN slash writing and reflected by the fans' queer use of the West in slash narratives.

Besides, as noted by Annamarie Jagose,

Heterosexuality, after all, has long maintained its claim to be a natural, pure and unproblematic state which requires no explanation. Indeed, in so far as many attempts to 'explain' homosexuality are grounded conceptually on heterosexuality, there is a sense in which heterosexuality is assumed to be a neutral or unmarked form of sexuality per se. (Jagose 1996, 17).

By introducing the Western cultural backgrounds, the fan writers allude to the "reasons" or the "origins" of the lesbian romances between Chinese characters. By means of this, they avoid directly challenging the self-evident status of heterosexuality in mainstream Chinese society. This narrative mode, therefore, becomes a settlement of the conflict between the fannish construction of fictional lesbianism and the mainstream Chinese context's rejecting of non-heterosexuality. It showcases the fans' own struggles to articulate queer fantasies within a cultural environment that denies the existence and legitimacy of non-heterosexuality.

Futuristic and Historical Settings

Futuristic and historical Jia Kong stories are not uncommon on FSCN. These backdrops are frequently appropriated by the fan writers to evade the current discriminations and oppressions against lesbianism and, thus, culturally legitimate their exploration of homoerotic possibilities between the characters. Since “the temporal settings have a strong influence on plotlines and the type of fantasy that is found in [romance stories]” (Linz 1992, 11), these settings seem to help the writers to complete more bold and utopian lesbian romances. Yet, such narrative settings often reflect both a subversion of heterocentric hegemony in the fictional world and the fan writers’ frustration with the unpleasant situation of non-heterosexuality in contemporary China.

In one futuristic fiction, One Thousand Years Late (Niao Shan Ming De YS 2007), the lesbian romance takes place in the year of 3032 in which there are ongoing intergalactic wars between human, robots, and aliens.²³ The author starts the story by stating that “Now is AD 3032 on the earth. ... Human civilization is on the verge of being destroyed by the rapid development of technology. ... Human obtains unprecedented freedom. ... [T]he so-called ethics has long been stamped out” (Niao Shan Ming De YS 2007). In such a chaotic future, love and sexual intimacy not only transcend the traditional boundaries of gender, sexuality, and species but also are sacred no more. Within this futuristic, permissive environment, the plot continues a lesbian love tragedy that failed 1000 years ago because of social pressure. The strategy of using futuristic and fantasy generic tropes to re-imagine lesbian romances discursively troubles the centrality of heterosexuality in present human society. However, the story automatically places lesbianism in opposition to contemporary social order and morality. The continuing of a lesbian romance in a chaotic, alien world suggests that lesbian relationships are only achievable when removed from the ethos of the current, heterocentric social system.

²³ The Chinese title of this fiction is Chi Dao Qian Nian.

Similarly, the stories set in ancient China are usually set in a time in which Chinese society was more strongly characterized by feudalism and patriarchy. The construction of lesbian romances in this kind of highly repressive context can be read as an ironic commentary on the marginalization of and discrimination against lesbians in the still-repressive present. Nevertheless, the historical plotlines in the fictions are always infused with some elements of cultural deviancy. This narrative maneuver implies that the existence of lesbianism is only possible in a deviant and/or disorderly social situation that contradicts current, mainstream, Chinese moral and social values.

In one fiction, Shanghai 1943 (Bu Lai Mei De Fu Qiao 2007), the Y/S lesbian love is set in the context of the Chinese civil war period during which Chinese women were severely subordinated and had no control of their own destiny.²⁴ This lesbian romance happens between two characters working in a Chinese Moulin Rouge in which most of the girls are escorts. In another instance of historical fiction, Peking Opera Blues (San Shao Nai Nai De Shang Zi 2007), the lesbian romantic story is set in a female-only Chinese traditional opera troupe during the anti-Japan war era.²⁵

Almost all the females in this troupe are portrayed to be non-heterosexual. This plot

²⁴ The Chinese title of this fiction is Shang Hai Yi Jiu Si San. The backdrop of the story is a time period before the founding of the People's Republic of China during which Chinese society was still at war.

²⁵ The Chinese title of this fiction is Dao Ma Dan. This kind of female troupe is frequently referred to as Kun Ban.

design is largely based on the cross-dressing tradition and transgenderism in this type of Chinese female troupe. These cultural positionings of lesbianism in the historical genre are manifestations of the fans' negotiation between queer subversions of the repressive, patriarchal society and conformity to normative definitions of lesbianism.

On the one hand, the historical genre can be understood as a detour to imagining nontraditional relationships between females that are unsettling to current, patriarchal, and heterosexual hegemony. It has been argued that, in romance fiction, historical settings are more often employed to “depict poverty, violence, and rape than are romances set in the present. ... [Because they] mak[e] the dramatization of such perils more remote and therefore less threatening” (Seidel 1992, 166). Indeed, most of these FSCN historical lesbian romances are accompanied with plots of rape, jealousy, revenge, sexual licentiousness, suicide, and sexual violence and abuse toward and between female characters. These dramatic, intense storylines and the permissive, chaotic, distant settings greatly propel the homosocial and homoerotic bondings between the subordinated females in the stories. As Maureen Quilligan (2005, 12-13) has pointed out, lesbianism is a way for women to retain their agency, actively express their desires, and refuse to be traded out in a patriarchal society. Through creating dramatic lesbian fantasies in historical, patriarchal settings, the writers speak discursively to the contemporary, repressive Chinese society. While a direct subversion of heterocentrism in mainstream Chinese culture seems unrealistic and less possible, these historical lesbian fantasies offer the fan readers a distant queer resistance against the real-world, dominant cultural forces that deny, marginalize, and silence women's same-sex desires.

On the other hand, although historical settings “have an advantage in creating fantasy worlds because our view of the past is selective” (Putney 1992, 99), selective historical Chinese contexts in these Jia Kong stories are not utopian queer fantasy worlds. The imagined lesbianism in the historical subgenre is not exempt from being defined by heterocentric hegemony. Similar to the Western plotlines, the historical settings are employed to present relatively “naturalized” lesbian romances developed through women's cross-gender identifications or emotional bonds in an authoritarian, patriarchal surrounding. In such cases, the fan writers attribute lesbian desires and relationships to the attachment of female friends in unconventional cultural environments. This means to “explain” lesbianism, to some extent, compromises with the heteronormative control over queer Chinese desires and identities that the fans try to overturn through slash writing.

In general, the lesbian romances in culturally distant settings often imply that contemporary, mainstream Chinese society offers no homosocial space for non-heterosexual people. The plots of most Jia Kong literature often suggest that those who want to have a lesbian relationship need to run away from the judgment of their peers, cut off their social ties with family members and friends, and live in either a culturally distant place or time in order to evade the pressures that could hinder the development of their non-mainstream love. This implication of the Jia Kong genre demonstrates the fan writers' deep frustration and constant negotiation with the normative and hegemonic repression and marginalization of lesbianism in the real world, contemporary Chinese society. These conflicts between virtual queer desires, fictional lesbian fantasies, and off-line, normative culture eventually make FSCN slash fiction a complicated social and cultural construct.

Slash Narratives are not an Escape

Some academic literature contends that slash fans have a tendency to ignore real-world, queer-related, social and political issues and to focus only on the pleasure generated through their play with same-sex desires (e.g., Lothian 2008; McLelland 2000a). As Rhiannon Bury claims, “[t]he function of romance fiction, even if it is queer, is to provide an escape from unpleasant realities; simply put, issues detract from the fantastical pleasures of such texts” (2005, 93-94). However, as can be seen from my analysis of FSCN slash writing, online, fannish, romantic stories, while they do provide a site for the fans to express and experience fictional lesbian fantasies, are neither unconcerned with nor completely detached from the local, repressive realities. Instead, FSCN slash narratives are where the fans elaborate their queer desires, struggle with mainstream, heteronormative images, negotiate with normative, patriarchal culture, and discursively voice their recognition of the undesirable situations of non-heterosexual females in contemporary China. Thus, my findings about the contradictions embodied in slash fiction question the perception of slash fandom as a utopian, queer site that is freed of normative and hegemonic culture. In the next chapter, I use an analysis of the general slash fan discourse on FSCN to query the alleged queer, subversive potential of online slash activity to liberate fans from the oppressive reality of the off-line, mainstream world and to allow everyone to “celebrate their difference” (Jones Paraphrasing Foucault 2009).

Chapter 3

Normativity and Queerness in FSCN Cultural Discourses

In addition to slash writing, the fans' queer readings of the show SG and queer gossip about the SG contestants also flood FSCN. As I mentioned in Chapter 2, the media discourse around SG includes homosocial connotations about its contestants that encourage the audience's queer fantasies. Since 2005, there have been large numbers of fan communities engaged in a variety of online queer reading activities devoted to some androgynous SG celebrities. According to Ling Yang's (2010) observation, the first online SG slash forum Chao Nv YY Wu Xian was built in August 2005 by fans of the second runner-up of 2005 SG, Liangying Zhang.²⁶ Also, both the winner and runner-up of 2005 SG have a great many slash fandoms online because of their tomboyish style and ambiguous relationships with other contestants. In 2006, online SG slash communities were further expanded by rampant lesbian rumors of a staggeringly large number of the androgynous contestants. In comparison to the off-line, heterocentric cultural context, virtual social spaces seem to afford a better place for queer fans to explicitly express their desiring voices for these androgynous celebrities' nontraditional gender and sexual identities. However, online SG slash fandom is not a unilateral, uncontested cultural environment.

Although the online fandoms of some androgynous SG contestants have become sites for fans to celebrate and emulate non-hegemonic gender and sexuality (e.g., Yang 2010; Yang & Bao 2012; Yue & Yu 2008), there is some discord between the contestants' online mainstream and slash fandoms. Some research points out that mainstream SG fan communities reject queer readings of SG (e.g., Yang 2010; Yang & Bao 2012). Yang (2010) has given two possible explanations for mainstream fans' reaction. According to her understanding, either mainstream fans' exclusive love for one particular SG celebrity or their distorted understandings of lesbianism can account for their rejection of the queer interpretations of the relationships between their idols and other SG contestants. In contrast, the SG slash fandom, FSCN, has been argued to be an inclusive, supportive cultural environment for homoerotic narratives and queer communities (Yang & Bao 2012, 8). These conceptualizations of online SG fan subculture not only simplify the intricate cultural discourses fans draw upon to voice their desires for unconventional gender and sexual performances but also ignore the dynamics of fans' cultural identities in cyberspace.

²⁶ The Chinese title of this forum means "unlimited homoerotic imaginings of Super Girl!" It is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/f?kw=%B3%AC%C5%AEYY%CE%DE%CF%DE>

Firstly, it is misleading to believe that SG mainstream and slash fan communities are mutually exclusive. Both mainstream and slash sites are places for fans to express their support for the androgyny of SG celebrities, yet through dissimilar discourses. While fans in mainstream forums voice their love for the celebrities from normative cultural positions, fans in slash fandom fulfill their queer fantasies about the celebrities in non-mainstream, imaginative communities. Meanwhile, fans are able to move between mainstream and slash fandoms and act in accordance with the cultural conventions of the specific site they visit. Thus, it is possible for some fans to join in both mainstream and slash communities online.

Moreover, slash identities are not opposed to normative and hegemonic ways of thinking. Rather, slash activity should be considered as a contestable cultural discourse that is not necessarily exempt from the intertwined influences of the repressive mainstream spaces and fans' own acculturation within normative culture. As Fiske has pointed out, "[f]antasy should not be opposed conceptually to reality, as though the two were mutually exclusive concepts" (1989, 124). Online slash discourses, in this sense, embody both virtual fantasies and "a piece of reality" (McRobbie 1984, 184). The struggle between fans' virtual queer desires within slash fandom and their normative identities inscribed in the mainstream, real world is what makes SG slash fandom a complex terrain of conflict and negotiation.

In this chapter, I analyze the complicated, fannish cultural discourses on FSCN. My analysis addresses the tensions between the fans' own slash identities, queer desires, and normative assumptions of lesbianism in cyberspace. I focus more on the ways the fans manage to isolate their virtual queer fantasies from both online and offline mainstream environments than on what exactly the fans queerly imagine and gossip about. I also pay close attention to the fans' responses to nonfictional lesbian topics, including the real-world lesbian scandals about some SG celebrities. By means of this, I show that FSCN is an imaginative, self-contained place for voicing fictional queer desires but not an empowering utopia that fully resists and subverts heterosexual hegemony. In addition to the analysis of the negotiation between normative and queer cultures within FSCN, I present some possible explanations for the eventual retreat of FSCN fans from online queer readings after the collapse of the boundary between their virtual queer fantasies and the nonfictional, real-world lesbian activities of the SG celebrities.

My exploration of the fan discourses on FSCN ultimately reveals that this slash fandom remains a middle ground between normative notions of deviant lesbianism and queer fantasies about media characters. Its fans' normative cultural positions in terms of identities and sexualities in both online and off-line mainstream environments often project onto their virtual slash practices surrounding the SG celebrities and, as a result, constantly suspend and impede their queer challenging of mainstream culture.

Online SG Mainstream and Slash Fandoms

FSCN is just one of numerous fan forums built on Baidu Post Bar (Baidu hereafter). As the most popular virtual communication site in mainland China, Baidu allows individual netizens to set up forums, create threads, share information, and communicate with each other. As of 2012, it has had more than 2,000,000 forums, most of which are fandoms of entertainment media and popular culture worldwide. Since 2005, both SG slash and mainstream fandoms have been set up on Baidu. The mainstream forums are named after individual SG celebrities and deemed as official sites for fans to share formal information about the celebrities. They are also filled with normative fan activities around the androgynous celebrities. Fans can post pictures showing the effeminate side of the celebrities, gossip about the romantic relationships between the SG celebrities and male stars, and share either fan-made or mainstream audiovisual materials featuring heterosexual romantic stories about the celebrities. Some fans also write heterosexual fan fiction and set up subforums to circulate the fiction. Many SG celebrities often visit their mainstream fan forums on Baidu, read fan entries, and communicate with their fans.

In comparison to its mainstream sites, SG slash forums on Baidu are more diversified in terms of the objects of the fandoms. They can focus either on one specific pairing or on one particular celebrity. For instance, the slash forum Chun Shang is dedicated to the pairing of two SG celebrities, Yuchun Li and Wenjie Shang; while the forum Shang Gong Shang Shou exclusively concentrates on the queer activities about Shang.²⁷ Some slash forums are devoted to all the possible pairings in one specific season of SG. FSCN is a good example of this kind of slash forum.

Different from the mainstream, heteronormative appreciations of the celebrities, there are many threads devoted to queer gossip about and imaginings of the celebrities in slash fandoms. In the slash threads, fans actively post the homoerotic pictures and videos of the celebrities, and gather and queerly discuss large amounts of secondary information through mainstream media, tabloids, and the celebrities' personal blogs. Based upon their rich associations of information, fans look into trivial details to intensify the official homosocial pairing of certain SG celebrities "performed" on the show. For example, in a slash thread on FSCN devoted to one popular pairing of two contestants, Fei Xu and Na Li, one fan posted a series of pictures in which the two were attending a show sponsored by Pepsi and wearing same-style Pepsi T-shirts (Xue Bu Neng Bu Fei 2008). In the following queer discussions of this thread, the fans imagine the contestants' behind-the-scenes lesbian relationship by closely analyzing their similar outfits, intimate gestures, and facial expressions. This kind of queer reading activity is abundant in SG slash fandom.

²⁷ Chun Shang forum is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/f?kw=%B4%BA%C9%D0>. Shang Gong Shang Shou forum is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/f?kw=%C9%D0%B9%A5%C9%D0%CA%DC>

Most Baidu forums are not access-controlled and allow visitors to read and respond to others' posts without registering as Baidu formal users or logging in. This feature greatly mobilizes SG fans. Many slash fans frequently go to mainstream sites to look for information that is worth further queerly interpreting. It is also not uncommon for mainstream fans to find online slash fandoms about their idols and start to participate in online queer activity. Numerous fans on FSCN insist that they are above all hardcore fans of some of the most popular androgynous SG celebrities. Some FSCN fans call themselves members of "Snow Pear" (Xue Li in Chinese) which is the name of the mainstream fan group of the SG celebrity Na Li. Others proclaim that they are in Liyang Liu's mainstream fan community named "Chestnut" (Li Zi in Chinese). Furthermore, there is a thread on FSCN comparing the size of Liu's and Shang's mainstream fan groups that are active in this slash fandom.²⁸ This well demonstrates that some slash fans simultaneously identify themselves as mainstream fans of certain SG celebrities.

The great mobility of online SG fans sometimes also escalates the conflicts over queer readings between heteronormative and queer fans within slash fandoms. Some mainstream, heteronormative fans post anti-queer entries on FSCN to condemn queer readings as personal affronts to the SG celebrities. In response to these posts, several senior slash fans openly declare that they are not mainstream, "pure" fans (Chun Fen in Chinese) of any individual SG celebrities, and scorn mainstream fans and fandoms (e.g., FIRE1001 2007; A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai 2007b). In a few extreme cases, some SG slash fandoms have been severely hacked by heteronormative fans or even forced to move to other communication platforms (Yang & Bao 2012, 6).

²⁸ The thread was created by Hua Li De 33 Luo Bo on September 25, 2006. It is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/135579815?pn=1>

Online SG fandoms allow its fans to possess both mainstream and slash identities and play in diverse discourses on different types of fan sites. As Hanmer has claimed, “[v]irtual queer fandom assists individuals to resist the hold of the local, in respect of a queer virtual online identity” (Hanmer 2010, 148). The identity discourse in SG fandoms permits slash fans to switch their cultural positions between the off-line normative, the online mainstream, and the virtual queer. While mainstream forums resemble off-line, local, heterocentric society, slash sites help some SG fans partially evade the repression, restraints, and discrimination in both online and off-line mainstream spaces. To some extent, the plurality and performativity of SG fan identities confirm Alexander Doty’s argument that “the queer often operates within the nonqueer, as the nonqueer does within the queer” (1993, xv). Yet, they further complicate the cultural discourses in which slash fans struggle with their normative stances and their queer desires.

Indeed, slash fans’ online queer practices defy the normative readings of the SG celebrities. But, meanwhile, their hegemonic positions often confine their queer imaginations to virtual, imagined worlds, hinder the transformation of imaginative queer practices into both online and off-line subversive activities, and sometimes even replicate the off-line othering of real-world lesbianism within online slash fandoms. In the following part of this chapter, my analysis of the fan discourses on FSCN exemplifies that the fans' isolating of their queer fantasies within a virtual, imaginative, exclusionary community is the result of the negotiation between their queer desires and normative concerns about both real-life lesbianism and virtual queerness.

Slash Identities of FSCN Fans

For online SG fans, posting information as registered Baidu formal users on a fan forum is a means to support the theme/object of that fandom. Usually, the more entries created by registered users the forum has, the more popular its theme/celebrity is. All registered Baidu users are required to create their own online user names. They are also allowed to create an unlimited number of different user names. Loyal SG fans prefer to login with their user names before they share information and communicate with others in the fandoms, as it is thought to be a way of showing respect to the celebrities and other fans.

What makes FSCN particularly interesting is that most of its slash fans have multiple pseudonyms. The names the fans create and use on FSCN usually imply their great interests in queering SG contestants. For instance, the user name, "Vanquished Y/S" (Zheng Fu Yang Shang in Chinese), refers to the pairing of Y/S and the song Vanquished sung by Liyang Liu and Wenjie Shang during their competition in the final round of SG in 2006. The user name, June F/X (Liu Yue Fei Xue in Chinese), refers to the nicknames of the two characters in the pairing of Fei Xu and Na Li, and the period of time in 2006 during which their homosocial bond was constructed and presented on SG. These expressive pseudonyms of FSCN fans implicitly voice their queer desires for and imaginations of certain SG pairings or contestants.

The fans refer to online user names as “waist coat(s)/clothes/skin(s)” (Ma Jia/Yi Fu/Pi in Chinese) and call the act of switching pseudonyms when moving from one site to another a “change of waist coats/clothes/skins” (Huan Ma Jia or Tuo Yi Fu/Pi in Chinese). Many active fans on FSCN also often post information on other mainstream forums of the SG celebrities. When participating in queer reading activities on FSCN, the fans tend to hide their slash identities from other mainstream fans by frequently switching between their mainstream and slash pseudonyms. Since most of the fans create new user names and change their pseudonyms often, there were even several “changing of waist coats” competitions held on FSCN. Sometimes, a few fans forget to change back to their slash pseudonyms after visiting mainstream sites. Then, their entries under some FSCN slash threads can be easily traced back through their mainstream names. After their mainstream user names are discovered by other FSCN fans, they beg others not to reveal their slash identities and pseudonyms on mainstream sites and ask to delete their slash entries posted under mainstream names.²⁹ A senior FSCN fan who discovered others’ mainstream names also made fun of these fans’ “carelessness” by saying that, “You guys often forget to change clothes. Now the evidence against you has fallen into my hands” (Shang Shu Fu Ge Ji 2007). As some anonymous fans implied during discussion, the reason for them not to use mainstream names on FSCN is because they dread the fans on mainstream sites finding out about their participation in queer practices (e.g., Anonymous 2007).

²⁹ For more details, see <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/166973394?pn=193>.

As Penley argues, “fans use pseudonyms not just for the joyful and imaginative expression of alternative and shifting identities. They also have something to hide” (1992, 494). Jung also feels that “many fans use pseudonyms, aware of the fact that their ‘hobby’ may not stand well with friends, family or employers” (2004). In this vein, the shifting of online pseudonyms and hiding of slash identities within FSCN help build an online “closet” for these slash fans. The refusal to come out of this online slash closet reveals that, while the fans celebrate their productive queer activities on FSCN, they are aware that their queer fantasies stay deviant and unacceptable to the majority of people in online, mainstream, social environments. By using and frequently changing pseudonyms, the fans manage to play their normative roles and keep their “abnormal” queer activities unknown to “normal” fans on mainstream sites.

The fans’ inclination to sustain their normative identities in mainstream spaces is also shown in the ways they perceive their own slash activity. Some FSCN fans advise other slash fans not to post queer discussions about SG contestants on mainstream sites, as they believe that this act will get slash fans into a lot of trouble (e.g., Pi Pi Xiao Luo Bo 2009; Liao Liao Ai Yang Shang 2006). Also, when FSCN fans post pictures and information borrowed from mainstream sites, they refer to their acts as “stealing” (Tou in Chinese). This word discloses the fans’ association of queer activities with underground, illegal practices that should be kept in secret. When queering the canonical materials drawn from mainstream media, the fans often use the word “convulse” (Chou in Chinese) to link their queer readings with a kind of abnormal, insane behavior. As demonstrated by these examples, the fans show a self-awareness of the controversial aspect of queering Chinese popular culture.

Queer desires, although no longer officially pathologized or criminalized in contemporary China, are still deemed as unjustified lust or psychological perversion in heteronormative, Chinese popular culture (Engebretsen 2008; Yang 2010). Even if fans have already confined their queer fantasies in a virtual, non-mainstream community, they still have an underlying discomfort with their queer practices and are afraid of being censured by online normative culture. Consequently, they separate and hide their slash identities from their normative relations in mainstream fandoms. In so doing, the fans are able to satisfy their queer desires and protect their non-mainstream, imaginative space while still performing in conformity with dominant ideologies that ostracize queer cultures in both online and off-line, mainstream, social environments.

Certainly, it would be essentializing to assume that all the fans on FSCN tend to sustain normative identities in either online or off-line spaces. Since FSCN is a femslash fandom fundamentally emphasizing the lesbian potential and romances of the SG celebrities, some fans on the site might be self-identified queers who have openly acknowledged their non-mainstream sexual preferences and/or cultural interests. These fans themselves may not try to deny their slash identities or feel uncomfortable with queering popular culture and celebrities. Yet, the slash activities within FSCN often exclude nonfictional lesbian topics and voices of self-identified queer fans. This characteristic of FSCN further unmasks some of its fans’ compliance with the hegemonic ideology that problematizes real-life lesbianism. This compromising posture of some FSCN fans compels them to culturally “normalize” their fictional, queer practices by rejecting nonfictional lesbianism within this online, non-mainstream, social space.

FSCN* is not about “Lesbian”

FSCN often openly others nonfictional lesbian topics and silences lesbian-identified fans. The administrators of FSCN frequently delete threads discussing the sexual orientations of the fans and investigating the number of self-identified butch and femme lesbians among the fans on the site. One of the main administrators of this forum, A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai (AXLZSH hereafter), in response to some fan discussions involving feminist and lesbian topics on FSCN, declared that “FSCN is neither a center for feminists nor a rallying point for lesbians” (2007c). Similarly, in a thread for announcing the records of banned user names and deleted, undesirable posts on FSCN, one fan also asserted that, “[some lesbian-themed] posts should be deleted, because [FSCN] is not a lesbian forum. Lesbian topics are not compatible with the content and nature of FSCN forum” (YS Bang Ming Bu Zhi Zhui Ming 2006). In addition, some FSCN fans often stress that “exclusive pairings” (Wang Dao in Chinese) of the SG celebrities are about neither homosexuality nor perversion (e.g., Jian Dan De Li Zi 2006; Liu Xu Piao Piao Fei Wu 2007). In a statement about “random discussions” on FSCN (Guan Shui in Chinese), AXLZSH explained the reason for annihilating nonfictional lesbian topics on the forum in this way: “FSCN is a gathering point for female GL fans (Tong Ren Nv in Chinese), [and] female GL fans are not homosexuals” (2006).

What makes this kind of anti-lesbianism yet pro-GL statement on FSCN more intriguing is a popular thread about lesbian media worldwide. In May 2007, AXLZSH created a thread titled “Beauty Comes in Twos——A Building of GL Pictures” (Mei Ren Cheng Shuang——GL Tu Lou in Chinese).³⁰ In the thread, AXLZSH posted hundreds of homoerotic images drawn from Chinese lesbian movies, Japanese girls’ love (GL hereafter) comics, American lesbian TV shows, Asian advertisements with lesbian connotations, and candid photos of real-life lesbians. As of July 2012, this thread has more than 2,070 following entries. In the annotations of the pictures, AXLZSH stated that, “these kinds of pictures have nothing to do with lesbian-themed topics” (2007a). Throughout the thread, AXLZSH kept emphasizing that all of these homoerotic media, including the American lesbian TV show The L Word, are GL but not about lesbianism. This awkward categorizing of fictional, lesbian media as non-lesbianism can be explained by a commonly-shared knowledge in Chinese GL fan culture. GL is usually thought to be imagined, fictional romantic/sexual relationships between females, while “lesbian/lesbianism” are terms referring to real-world, nonfictional lesbian identities, desires, and relationships (letusgo 2011). Although some of the images clearly present real-life lesbians, AXLZSH denies this fact and strives to create a difference between the lesbian media images fantasized about by the fans and nonfictional lesbianism. In this way, she further promotes this slash fandom as a fantasy place where fans can appreciate and appropriate homosocial/homoerotic images and texts from a queer angle but not a virtual utopia for fans of non-heterosexual orientations to communicate about nonfictional lesbian desires.

³⁰ It is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/198230695?pn=1>

These online fan statements in general show an explicit exclusion of and intolerance toward real-world lesbianism within FSCN. By emphasizing the fictional, imaginative nature of their online slash activity, the fans attempt to distinguish slash identities from real-life lesbian identities. This attempt actually reflects some FSCN fans' frustration with their own virtual queer practices and desires that are defined as deviant by mainstream culture. The prioritizing of the fans' slash activities over the practices of self-identified lesbians on FSCN, although aimed at validating the status of slash culture, eventually produces a cultural hierarchy within this fandom. Alexis Lothian opines that slash fans often make their queer social space "end up exclusionary, revolutionizing the lives of only a chosen few" (2008). Yet, the cultural discrimination of FSCN makes this slash fandom not only exclusionary but also normative to certain queer fans.

In his study of a Hong Kong femslash fandom, Cheuk Yin Li (2012) finds out that some homophobic fans participate in online slash fandom to look for evidence to empower their own anti-queer identities. Nonetheless, the exclusion of real-world lesbian topics made by AXLZSH and some other fans on FSCN does not simply represent a straightforward disdain for lesbianism. Rather, the ways these fans play at virtual queerness show that FSCN is a more convoluted field of contestations and negotiations with respect to desires and sexualities. These fan performances unveil an ideological struggle between the fans' queer desires repressed by online and off-line mainstream cultures and their normative views of real-life lesbianism. The fans' divorcing of their queer fantasies from nonfictional lesbian themes is a representation of their eagerness for gaining legitimacy in mainstream society and obtaining a more "justified" cultural position within slash fandom. By showing a disinterest in nonfictional lesbianism, the fans successfully participate in slash practices without overstepping the boundary between the constructed, media world and heteronormative reality. This paradoxical aspiration for both fulfilling queer fantasies and maintaining normative identities in the real world is also illustrated by FSCN fans' queer readings of the celebrities.

Queer Readings of the SG Celebrities

Similar to the pairings in slash writing in this fandom, the fans' queer readings are also limited to the "pre-existing" homosocial pairings of the celebrities that have been presented on the show. One distinctive characteristic of the queer reading activities on FSCN is that most fans are more than happy to see queer gossip about and imaginings of lesbian romances between the SG contestants. For example, one of the most popular slash threads on FSCN is devoted to the pairing of F/X.³¹ This thread was started by AXLZSH in May 2006. It is flooded with screen captures of SG, news coverage about Fei Xu and Na Li from mainstream media, and the fans' own queer gossip about these two contestants' close friendship. As of July 2012, it had more than 26,500 posts. There also are many slash threads on FSCN exclusively devoted to a single SG contestant. In these kinds of threads, the fans focus on queer imaginings of the homoerotic relationships between this particular celebrity and multiple other SG contestants.

³¹ This thread is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/102535402?pn=1>.

When exploring real person slash writings and discussions in Western fandom, Kristina Busse discovers that “for most fans, celebrities are simultaneously real and fictional, and . . . fans can talk about their fantasies as if they were real while being aware that this ‘reality’ merely constitutes a fandomwide conceit” (2006, 209).

According to Busse (2006, 214), it is not uncommon for both fan writers and slash fans in general to maintain that their queer imaginations are only constructed and should be distinguished from rumors. These findings are well exemplified by the fans’ queer reading practices on FSCN. Although slashing the celebrities allows the fans to enthusiastically engage in activities that fulfill their queer desires, a large number of FSCN fans are reluctant or even resistant to discussing the true sexual orientations of these public figures. Once the queer fantasies about certain SG celebrities blur the line between the fictional, media world and reality, the fans start to question the legitimacy of their queer reading practices.

A great many fans in this forum exhort others to be aware of the distinction between reality and what they queerly imagine. Fei Xue Bao Zi, a senior slash fan on FSCN who started one of the most influential threads devoted to Liyang Liu, once urged other followers in this thread not to take exclusive pairings between certain SG contestants too seriously. In her response to other slash fans’ passionate engagement in queer discussions, Fei Xue Bao Zi used Chinese words like “YY” (queerly imagine) and “Xi” (plays) to draw a clear distinction between reality and the fans’ unrealistic queer fantasies about Liu and her potential homoerotic relationships with other androgynous SG contestants. As she stated, “any exclusive pairings are only the fans’ queer wishful thinking. We should use them to entertain ourselves, but try not to get deeply involved in these fictional plays” (Fei Xue Bao Zi 2006).

Another case in point is the afterword of FSS. After finishing the major part of the novel, the author CO521 wrote a short postscript to the avid fans of this story:

Liu and Shang in FSS are not Liu and Shang in my mind . . .

The so-called slash only means two persons, somebody and somebody, performing a couple in a play. When the shows are over, they continue to go about their own lives.

The so-called exclusive pairing does not mean that anything romantic really happened between these two persons, but you are inclined to believe that they once had something special. That is all. (CO521 2007).

This statement distances the widely-influential, fictional, lesbian, romantic story from the personal lives of these two celebrities in the off-line, real world. Furthermore, it confirms slash fans’ intention to use online queer activity as a playground of unrealistic, fictional, queer imagination, one that should not be confused with reality.

FSCN fans refuse to merge the SG celebrities’ real-life sexualities into their fictional slash writing and queer reading practices. Even though these celebrities have become well-known for their androgynous personas, they remain constructed characters who can only legitimately play lesbian roles in the fans’ imagined worlds. As Penley says, what slash fans explore is “an erotic homosexual subtext [embedded in the primary text] . . . that could easily be made to be there” (1991, 137). Yet, this characteristic of FSCN fan activity can also be read as a result of the fans' inner conflict over their queer desires. In conformity with the heterosexual hegemony of mainstream social and cultural environments, the fans restrict their queer imaginations to what the media text already implies and keep the voicing of their "abnormal" fantasies within this imaginative community. The fans see this detour to queer desires as more legitimate than real-life lesbianism. Once real-world, lesbian-related issues intrude in the fannish world, the border between the virtual, imaginative space, where all impossible things can happen, and the physical world, which is run by heterocentric ideologies, is traversed. In order to guard heterosexual hegemony in the mainstream world, the fans retreat and rebuild the boundary between reality and online queer imaginations by eliminating nonfictional lesbian rumors within this slash fandom.

Jung has noted that one controversial contention of some Western slash fans, that the queering of a media figure is offensive to the actor/actress playing the role in mainstream media, is essentially a "homosexual panic" imposed by mainstream culture (2004). In this sense, the tendency to dodge the discussions about the real sexual preferences of the SG celebrities on FSCN can be argued to be an instance of lesbian panic. For example, in the most influential slash thread devoted to the pairing of F/X, the posts directly referring to the contestants' lesbian identities are usually thought to be from their detractors, and are quickly removed from the forum by administrators or ignored by the majority of the fans. At one point, several fans interjected and posted some information and pictures disclosing the real lesbian identities of Fei Xu and Na Li (e.g., FIRE1001 2006; Ren Jian FISH 2006). In response to the posts, only a few fans showed interest in discussing whether Xu and Li are lesbians in reality (e.g., flysnowforever 2006). However, this nonfictional, lesbian gossip was constantly interrupted by comments like “Do not mix your queer imagination with reality,” (e.g., Fei Xue Ji Di 2006b) or “Do not involve the private lives of these contestants in this. Only mind our own queer fantasies” (e.g., Fei Xue Ji Di 2006a).

FSCN fans’ ultimate lesbian panic can be better illustrated by their queer readings of Liyang Liu. In the thread titled, “A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu” (Guangzhou Liu Tong Xue Tu Lou in Chinese), the fans actively post pictures of Liu, eulogize Liu’s androgynous persona, and queerly read the homosocial bonds between Liu and other SG contestants.³² This thread was created in July 2006. As of May 2012, it has had nearly 900,000 hits and more than 22,000 entries. Unlike the fictional promotion of Liu’s butch lesbian identity in slash writing, few posts in the thread directly point to Liu’s potential lesbian identity in real life. During the queer reading of Liu in this thread, the fans devote most of their attention to appreciating how “dreamy” and “princely” her outward appearance is (e.g., Fu Huo YY 2006). Most of the fan expressions avoid connecting her real-life, tomboyish look with a butch identity by elevating her off-screen androgyny to a kind of fashionable style. They frequently use expressions associated with traditional females, such as “pretty,” “beautiful,” “innocent,” “graceful,” and “elegant,” to praise her outward appearance.

³² The title of this thread refers to the city of SG preliminary round which Liu was in, Guangzhou. It was created by Fei Xue Bao Zi on August 13, 2006. It is available at <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568>

In such threads, the word “handsome” (Shuai in Chinese) is also frequently applied to Liu. As Li (2012) found out, the use of “handsome” to describe female celebrities is attacked by some Hong Kong fans, as it has a butch-identity implication. But, in both SG mainstream and slash fandoms, this word is quite commonly used in an identity discourse of “neutrosexuality” (Zhong Xing in Chinese).

Neutrosexual/Neutrosexuality are newly-emergent, popular Chinese words “referring to transgression of hegemonic gender scripts in fashion and style” (2011, 4). Chinese fans often use “neutrosexual” to “beautify and camouflage the stigmatized identity of butch lesbian. [Because n]eutrosexual is now a safer and less socially sanctioned word” (Li 2011, 5).

The fashioning of Chinese neutrosexual identities in recent years can be better explained by the fans’ or even many Chinese females’ conflicting feelings about female androgyny. In a traditional patriarchal society like China, androgynous females who defy conventional feminine traits, transgress a heteronormative gender binary, and threaten the hegemonic position of males are not only stigmatized but also linked to gender identity disorders. Many netizens, especially self-claimed heterosexual males, who dislike this high-profile female androgyny on TV, call these female celebrities “brother” (Ge in Chinese).³³ This appellation usually aims to insult and implies that these females are transsexuals and/or prefer to cross-dress as males. Analogous to modern Western societies in which transsexuality and transvestism are frequently positioned as “the most despised sexual castes” (Rubin 1984, 151), mainstream Chinese society severely demonizes and pathologizes these sexual “deviancies.” Chinese females who are androgynous and/or supportive of androgyny use the concept of neutrosexuality to detach female androgyny from the more problematic connotations of female transsexualism.

³³ One case in point is the 2005 SG winner, Yuchun Li, who has been named “Chun Ge” by many Chinese netizens.

SG fans often praise these “neutrosexual” celebrities for their “both beautiful and handsome” looks (You Shuai You Mei in Chinese). In so doing, fans categorize the androgyny of the SG celebrities as a type of “female masculinity” that embodies both desirable masculine and feminine traits (Engebretsen 2009, 6; Halberstam 1998, 5-9; Yue & Yu 2008, 123). This way to frame the nontraditional gender and sexual performances of the SG celebrities promotes their androgyny as a faddish gender ideal without explicitly linking it to lesbian or transsexual identities. In Liu’s thread on FSCN, the fans continue this mainstream tradition to frequently describe Liu as “neutrosexual” and “handsome.” Nevertheless, these words have no obvious lesbian connotations, but are discursive expressions to normalize and advocate her androgynous performance while dodging the stigmatization and persecution associated with non-heterosexuality.

The tendency to shy away from the discussions about Liu’s sexual orientation was highlighted in this slash fandom when Liu was involved in a lesbian scandal that was largely downplayed by the fans. In July 2010, to exert revenge on Liu after an ugly breakup, Liu’s ex-girlfriend spoke out about their lesbian relationship, posting their text messages, pictures, and chat records in a blog.³⁴ Right after this scandal erupted, the queer readings of and slash writings about Liu and Shang on FSCN, which had been ongoing for more than four years, suddenly died down. And updates to the most viewed thread for Liu subsequently stopped.³⁵ Although not a single fan straightforwardly discussed this scandal in Liu's thread, a few posts revealed the fans' disappointment with Liu. In a comment, one anonymous fan implicitly expressed her frustration with this scandal: "I always try to forget her (Liu), as she is not the one supposedly appearing in my world" (Anonymous 2010a). Later, another anonymous fan referred to the invalidation of many previously-posted pictures of Liu in this thread as "bubbles vanishing into thin air" (Anonymous 2010b). Several fans also discursively expressed that they still believe that Liu is a good person and wish that Liu can find a decent lover eventually (e.g., Fu Huo YY 2010; Wang Dao Zai Na 2010). As these expressions illustrate, some slash fans have been well aware of Liu's off-screen lesbian identity. Yet, the fans' self-silencing of their queer readings of Liu in the face of evidence of her real sexuality provide the ultimate rejection of real-world lesbianism within FSCN.

It is hard to determine why exactly the fans abandoned their queer activities about Liu. Several socio-cultural factors, though, might either directly or discursively contribute to this phenomenon. As shown in the above analysis, many senior and ³⁴ The article was originally titled "Those Things between Liyang Liu and Me (Wo He Liu Liyang De Na Xie Shi Er in Chinese)." This article and the pictures posted in the blog were deleted later by the author because of social pressure. Yet, this lesbian scandal had been reported and reprinted by many online and mainstream media outlets.

³⁵ The queer reading activities in Liu's most popular thread stopped for more than one year and four months after the outbreak of the lesbian scandal. As of December 2011, the thread had been continued by several fans. However, this thread has been altered to a place for posting Liu's pictures. Queer-natured discussions around Liu have become unpopular and rare in the thread since then.

leading fans on FSCN are supportive of queer readings of fictional lesbian media. Meanwhile, they consciously discourage nonfictional lesbian communication and dis-identify with real-life non-heterosexuals within this slash fandom. As José Esteban Muñoz (1999) has argued, “[d]isidentification is meant to be descriptive of the survival strategies the minority subject practices in order to negotiate a phobic majoritarian public sphere that continuously elides or punishes the existence of subjects who do not conform to the phantasm of normative citizenship.” Since many of these FSCN fans are involved in both slash activity and mainstream fan communities, they can be seen as cultural queers who strive to survive in online, normative, public spaces. While dis-identifying with non-heterosexual identities, these fans simultaneously emphasize their identification with a less disruptive cultural identity—online fans of fictional “non-lesbian GL” media. This process serves as an ultimate negotiation of these slash fans to justify their imaginative, queer playground and dodge the persecution of normative culture.

On the other hand, fans who are real-life sexual minorities and/or more open-minded about plural and fluid sexualities in reality might either be excluded from the fandom or offended by the discriminatory and normative aspects of FSCN. In turn, they may choose to only consume queer productions on FSCN without actively participating in queer reading practices. This internal power structure of FSCN might eventually lead the fandom to become an exclusionary, expressive place for those who have been in self-denial of their cultural queer identities or internalized a negative attitude toward real-world non-heterosexuality. Correspondingly, after the unexpected revelation of Liu's sexuality, most of the FSCN fans who used to be active in slashing Liu might have found it disturbing to continue fantasizing about and identifying with real lesbians. As a result, they discarded this imaginative community.

Also, the silence of this slash forum can be an extreme strategy for the “virtually-closeted” queer fans to seek escape from heteronormative reality. Queerness is always classified as deviance in the off-line, mainstream Chinese world (Engebretsen 2009, 5-6) and equated with obscenity in mainstream, Chinese Internet culture (Sohu 2009). Thus, the fans' virtual performances on FSCN are inextricably connected with their deep-seated concerns about their own queer identities in online and/or off-line mainstream spaces. On the one hand, in order to loosen the restraints of mainstream culture, the fans realize their queer fantasies in a private, self-contained, online community. On the other hand, since “virtual environment can suggest no identities are authentic” (Hanmer 2010, 149), they can keep their off-line, real-world, normative identities intact. Nonetheless, even if playing at queerness only within cyberspace, the fans remain reticent about their queer desires in online mainstream environments. This way of achieving queer readings of popular culture renders online slash activity “a highly personal exploration of desires” (Busse 2006, 211). It also confirms a general preference of Chinese queers for “invisibility and unspeakability” (Liu & Ding 2005, 48) in order to save face and sustain normative connections in the traditional Chinese world (Engebretsen 2008, 103-104). FSCN, therefore, serves as a battlefield between these fans' virtual queer desires and real-world normative positions.

Pop stars are constructed images that offer fans points of identification (Dyer 1998; Stacey 1991; Rojek 2001; Turner 2004). As elaborated by Turner, fans' cultural consumption of celebrity is "a continual play between identification and 'dis-identification.' Discovering, imagining and discarding identities is something that can be accomplished precisely without penalty [in this process]" (2004, 102). Slash activities, in particular, are ways for fans to "control and manipulate these identifications" (Busse 2006, 216). In this sense, the fictional queer discourses on FSCN are where the fans are able to deal with issues of their own non-mainstream desires and identities. Once the celebrities' real-life sexuality and the fans' conceived fantasies overlap, the equilibrium between the fans' virtual queerness and real-world normative identities is broken. Once the objects of their identifications become real lesbians, their fannish, private, personal, virtual desires are simultaneously extended to reality and become real. Under this circumstance, the fans are forced to come out of this virtual closet and to face the heterosexual hegemony of the physical world. In order to avoid confronting their own queerness, the fans eventually choose to quit their queer fantasies in this online fandom.

Some research has argued that online slash fans tend to keep their queer discussions about the non-heterosexuality of celebrities low profile, as this kind of topic is taboo in mainstream, public spaces and often infringes on celebrities' privacy (Busse 2006, 216; Li 2012). In this light, it is likely that some slash fans stopped their online queer readings to protect the celebrities they adore from the potential social pressures and discriminations caused by lesbian rumors like these.

Although, in the last two decades, there have been waves of political and social appeals for elevating the status of non-heterosexuals in China (Engebretsen 2009, 3-4), mainstream Chinese society is “hardly congenial territory for sexual minorities” (Gross 2003, 267). As addressed by Elisabeth Lund Engebretsen who researches Chinese lesbian communities, “[t]he dominant [public] attitude is one of prevailing stigma and negative stereotypes that attach homosexuality firmly to medical and moral deviance, or even crime. Discrimination and ignorance about homosexuality is considerable [in current Chinese society]” (2009, 4). As a conservative, patriarchal nation, mainstream Chinese society appears to be more hostile to non-heterosexual females than to non-heterosexual males. According to the observation of one New York Times reporter who has spent more than 5 years in one of the most open cities in mainland China, Shanghai, “the public emergence of gay men [became] an increasing evident fact of daily life.... though, open same-sex relationships among females here lagged far behind” (French 2010). Even for those Chinese lesbians who have no intention of hiding their sexuality, “open queer rights activism or direct ‘coming out’ rarely happen ... [and is thought] to be undesirable, meaningless and morally bad: selfish, pointless, unfair [towards parents]” (Engebretsen 2008, 97).

Within such a cultural environment, it would be a better choice for young, female Chinese pop stars to let the lesbian controversy automatically die down than to directly respond to the scandals. Since it is not difficult for anti-lesbian netizens to find out about FSCN and connect its slash productions with the celebrities’ real-life sexuality, the fans’ celebration of queer readings after the eruption of the celebrities’ lesbian rumors might further position the lesbian celebrities in the center of the controversy. Therefore, some FSCN fans' self-discipline might be attempts at protecting the celebrities' privacy and avoiding the exacerbation of the public disputes over their idols' real-life sexualities.

Whatever the reasons for it, the fans' sudden silencing of their own queer, desiring voices on FSCN indicates that, even in online slash fandom, fans need to constantly negotiate with hegemonic ideology that regards lesbianism in the off-line, Chinese world as dishonorable, disturbing, or even monstrous. The fans' eventual backing out of their slash writings and queer readings of the Chinese celebrities after learning that they are likely lesbians in the real world reveals that they ultimately choose to give up their virtual, queer fantasy wonderland under pressure from mainstream Chinese culture.

Heterotopia and the FSCN Forum

Foucault's term, "heterotopia" (1986), is frequently borrowed by fan scholars to describe the liberating and empowering potential of online slash fandom (e.g., Bury 2005; Li 2012). According to Foucault, heterotopias "are something like counter-sites, a kind of effectively enacted utopias in which the real sites ... are simultaneously represented, contested, and inverted" (1986, 24). Following Foucault's definition, Rhiannon Bury believes that heterotopias should be understood "in terms of resistance, inversion, subversion or perhaps simply a space in which active consent to normative practices is suspended" (2005, 17). Echoing this conceptualization of heterotopias as anti-normative sites, Jones further elaborates that [Q]ueer heterotopias are sites of empowerment. ... Queer heterotopias exist in opposition to heteronormative spaces and are spaces where individuals seek to disrupt heterosexist discourses [and] ... where individuals attempt to dislocate the normative configurations of sex, gender, and sexuality through daily exploration and experimentation with crafting a queer identity (Jones 2009).

According to these studies, online slash fandom functions as a special kind of queer heterotopia that is politically subversive, anti-heteronormative, and counter-hegemonic. However, fans' virtual queer desires are still "situated in a historically and culturally inscribed space [informed by the] multiple directions of cultural influence" (Wekker 2006, 225). Meanwhile, "[social] space is a [social] product" (Lefebvre 1992, 26). Thus, online social sites for playing out queer fantasies cannot guarantee an indigenously queer place that is exempt from the permeation of normative culture. As we have seen in the case of FSCN, there are multilayered contestations between slash fans' queer desires, online and off-line mainstream cultures, and the fans' own, internalized, normative ideas about virtual queerness and real-world lesbianism.

Muñoz notes that minorities' appropriation of mainstream media representations aims to "disassemble that sphere of publicity and use its parts to build an alternative reality" (1999, 196). In this vein, FSCN does provide a playground for realizing queer fans' constructed, alternate imaginings of media characters. Dissimilar to the outright rejection of fictional queer fantasies within mainstream fandoms, the FSCN forum offers a certain degree of freedom and leaves more space for SG fans to empower themselves through a diversity of explicit, queer activities. It is queer in the sense that it allows slash fans to respond to Chinese popular culture from an angle disruptive to their off-line identities and sexualities defined and confined by normative culture. With little doubt, the fan activities in the forum help increase lesbian representations and voice queer fantasies in the virtual world. Therefore, I do not question the empowering potential of its slash activities.

However, the alternate scenarios created by the fans on this forum always remain fictional and provisional. As elucidated by Li, “queer is always a dynamic, contradictory, and imperfect notion to challenge normative categorization of identities and subjectivities” (2012). My investigation highlights the imperfect aspect of the queer discourses on FSCN. The fans’ slash practices within this fandom are often complicated, distorted, and interrupted by the inevitable infiltration of normative and hegemonic assumptions of identities and sexualities. Without truly liberating all kinds of gender, sexual, and cultural minorities, FSCN only has a limited effect in realizing gender and sexuality boundary transgression and amplifying certain kinds of fictional, queer voices and desires. In consequence, it would be problematic to name it a queer heterotopia. Drawing support from my case study of the FSCN forum, I argue that the emancipating potential of online slash fandom should be neither overlooked nor overstated.

Chapter 4

Conclusion

Along with the accelerated flow of online information, a large amount of academic research has accentuated the great potential of virtual imaginative spaces to resist local repressions, to raise the political stakes of marginalized groups, and to facilitate non-mainstream communication between disadvantaged individuals. Yet, the supposedly empowering and liberating functions of online communication, especially within conservative, mainstream social and cultural environments, need to be further examined. Far from a simple matter of resistance and subversion to mainstream society, online non-mainstream activity is emblematic of the struggles, conflicts, and negotiations between dominant and subordinate cultures.

Unlike many previous studies that hold an optimistic view of virtual social spaces as utopias for gender, sexual, and cultural minorities repressed by heterocentric societies, my project has provided an analysis of online slash fandom as a contestable cultural arena. Using FSCN as an example, I have focused specifically on Chinese queer fans' struggles over their queer desires and attitudes toward queerness in mainstream culture. Certainly, online slash activity in which audiences provide queer responses to mainstream popular culture transgresses some normative and hegemonic assumptions of gender and sexuality. Such fans employ revolutionary strategies to interpret popular culture, such as queer readings, "going far beyond the familiar terrain of gossip to claim a much wider cultural territory for oppositional and resistant readings" (Gross 2001, 153), and "wearing girlslash goggles" which "enable you to see lesbian desire where it might otherwise be invisible...” (Russo 2007). Yet, in many ways, mainstream media images, dominant cultural conventions, online and off-line social experiences, and hegemonic ideologies deeply-rooted in society often shape, complicate, and thwart slash fans’ virtual queer interpretations and imaginations. As argued through my examinations of FSCN slash narratives and queer reading practices, online slash culture is neither a straightforward challenge to Chinese heterocentric, patriarchal hegemonies, nor a completely escapist fantasy separated from the fans’ acculturation within and concerns with their local, repressive realities. FSCN fans have conflicting feelings about their queer fantasies and slash activity, hide their slash identities, normalize the fictional lesbianism in their queer imaginations, and elevate the status of slash culture or protect their own or their idols’ real-world, normative identities. This can result in the silencing of nonfictional lesbian topics within this online, imaginative, fannish space. For these reasons, online slash fandom does not necessarily promise a queer heterotopia. Rather, my research suggests that slash fandom should be considered and studied as a complex, cultural terrain of negotiations and contestations.

Admittedly, my project is limited in scope and left some questions for further research to explore. One possible direction would be the representations of gender and sexuality in other similar-style Chinese reality/idol TV shows and their online fandoms. For instance, the singing contest, My Hero (Jia You! Hao Nan Er in Chinese), is a SG-style show held by Shanghai-based Dragon TV. It exclusively allows male contestants and features many androgynous, beautiful, young male participants. During its broadcast, there were many gay rumors about its contestants. Further research may look at the queer potential of this show and the dynamics of its online fan cultures. The questions of whether and how the queer aspect of the show is highlighted by the show's producers and articulated by its fans need to be answered.

Similarly, another reality TV show presented by HNTV, Happy Boy (Kuai Le Nan Sheng in Chinese) is the male counterpart of SG. Many famous SG slash writers on FSCN, such as CO521, are rumored to be active slash fans of this show and write slash fiction about Happy Boy contestants in its online slash fandoms as well. Thus, a comparative study of SG and Happy Boy slash literature could be fruitful further research. One possible focus of that research might be the ways these slash writers frame homoerotic relationships in both slash fandoms. Another valuable focus of this kind of research could be an exploration of the similarities and differences between Chinese femslash and male/male slash cultures. Also, one might continue to explore the negotiation between queer and mainstream cultures I have documented in SG slash fandom within Happy Boy fandoms.

My study has not fully explored the question of why androgynous celebrities become extremely successful and well-liked in today's Chinese popular culture. To better answer this question, scholars concentrating on Chinese queer culture might need to consider the historical, political, social, and cultural shaping of younger generations of Chinese audiences across identity categories rather than looking exclusively at gender and sexual minorities.

Furthermore, additional research might compare mainstream and slash fandoms devoted to the same celebrities. There have been many conflicts between online mainstream and slash fans of some of the most popular androgynous SG celebrities, such as Yuchun Li or Wenjie Shang. Yet, according to my observation, many mainstream fans are well-aware of the lesbian identities or potential of their idols and they only pretend to go against queer readings of these celebrities when participating in mainstream social environments. Nevertheless, this type of research would require a more detailed analysis of mainstream culture on the SG celebrities' official fan sites than what I have presented in Chapter 3. I suggest that further studies follow this direction to investigate the confusing, controversial virtual personas and identities of SG fans and their performativity within mainstream cultural environments.

Furthermore, since my study has only employed discourse analysis, the more specific demographics of and the direct cultural responses from SG fan groups are hard to specify in the project. Also, as FSCN is the only online slash fan site being analyzed in this research, some of my findings might be limited to this specific fandom. More research needs to be done to test the efficacy and applicability of my study. Hence, to further research focusing on the same or similar topics, I recommend using multi-sited ethnography. By the definition of anthropologist George E. Marcus, "multi-sited research is designed around chains, paths, threads, conjunctions, or juxtapositions of locations in which the ethnographer establishes some form of literal, physical presence, with an explicit, posited logic of association or connection among sites that in fact defines the argument of the ethnography" (1995, 105). The reason for utilizing this research method to examine online fandom can be explained by Paula Saukko's words. As she claims, "multi-sited research ... locates a social phenomenon within a wider social and, possible global, context, pointing at connections that exist between what one is studying and other social processes or locations" (Saukko 2003, 194). In this vein, I believe that it is a wise choice for further research to use multi-sited ethnography to study online slash fans of different media forms and genres or of celebrities in diverse cultures and nations. In so doing, researchers can better connect local realities with international, transnational, and cross-cultural contexts and better link online slash culture with a multitude of off-line, mainstream cultures across the world.

Nowadays, while queer communities are diversifying and proliferating in virtual spaces, academic debates worldwide in online queer studies are also multiplying. Some see online, non-mainstream sites as gathering points for queers (e.g., Gross 2003). Others understand online spaces as better locations for performing virtual queerness than off-line, mainstream environments (e.g., Bury 2005). Yet, these academic debates themselves also raise questions about the future of online queer studies. What should be the major focus of the research on online queer cultures and groups? Should we look at online queer spaces as pure, non-normative utopias or as anti-realist fantasy arenas? Is it necessary that the virtual spaces occupied by cultural and/or sexual minorities are freed from the influences of off-line normativity and hegemony of desires and sexualities? Do the cultural discrimination, isolation, and hierarchy subordinating certain gender, sexual, and cultural identities exist in these virtual queer spaces? Although far from answering all of these questions in depth, my project has pointed out possible directions and laid them out for further academic discussions. In line with some innovative research on Asian slash culture (e.g., Wood 2006; Yang & Bao 2012), my project has opened up new possibilities for a wide range of explorations of non-Western, transnational, and cross-cultural slash.

Work Cited

- A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai. 2006. "About the Issue of Random Discussions." FSCN, October 10. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/139250919?pid=1208799876&cid=0#1208799876>
- A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai. 2007a. "Beauty Comes in Twos——A Building of GL Pictures." FSCN, May 6. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/198230695?pn=1>
- A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai. 2007b. "Tell Pure Fans, How to Differentiate X Haters Here." FSCN, June 1. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/207776234?pid=1948796690&cid=0#1948796690>
- A Xiu Luo Zhi Shu Hai. 2007c. "[ChuCiMuGe] Mo Shi Ran Chen Ai." FSCN, August 22. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/252000513?pid=2464416716&cid=0#2464416716>
- Allison, Anne. 1996. Permitted and Prohibited Desires: Mothers, Comics, and Censorship in Japan. Boulder: Westview.
- Amberson, James. 2008. "Queer Diaspora." Gender, Culture and Society, November 11. <http://sc6214.wetpaint.com/page/Queer+Diaspora>.
- Anonymous. 2007. "Sheng Sheng Bu Xi (One) Qing Cheng. Qing Shang." FSCN, April 17. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/166973394?pn=193>
- Anonymous. 2010a. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, July 25. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568?pn=733>
- Anonymous. 2010b. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, September 7. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568?pn=734>
- Aoyama, Tomoko. 1988. "Male Homosexuality as Treated by Japanese Women Writers." In The Japanese Trajectory: Modernization and Beyond, edited by Gavan McCormack and Yochio Sugimoto, 186-204. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bacon-Smith, Camille. 1992. Enterprising Women: Television Fandom and the Creation of Popular Myth. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Barnhurst, Kevin G., eds. 2007. Media Q: Media/Queered: Visibility and Its Discontents. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, Inc.
- Battels, Kathleen. 2008. "Do We Need a Gay Rights Saving Time?" Flowtv 7 (10). <http://flowtv.org/2008/04/do-we-need-a-gay-rights-saving-time/#>

- Benshoff, Harry M.. 1998. "Secrets, Closets, and Corridors through Time: Negotiating Sexuality and Gender Through Dark Shadows." In Theorizing Fandom: Fans, Subculture and Identity edited by Cheryl Harris and Alison Alexander, 199-218. Cresskill, New Jersey: Hampton Press INC.
- Berger, Richard. 2010. "Out and About: Slash Fic, Reimagined Texts and Queer Commentaries." In LGBT Identity and Online New Media, edited by Christopher Pullen and Margaret Cooper, 173-185. New York: Routledge.
- Berry, Chris, and Fran Martin. 2000. "Queer 'n' Asian on—and off—the Net: The Role of Cyberspace in Queer Taiwan and Korea." In Web Studies: Rewriting Media Studies for the Digital Age, edited by David Gauntlett, 74-81. London, UK: Edward Arnold.
- Bonner, Frances. 2003. Ordinary Television: Analyzing Popular TV. London: Sage.
- Bu Lai Mei De Fu Qiao. 2007. "Shanghai 1943." FSCN, May 12.
<http://tieba.FSCN.com/f?kz=200802424>
- Buckley, Sandra. "Penguin in Bondage: A Tale of Japanese Comic Books." In Technoculture edited by Constance Penley and Andrew Ross, 163-195. Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press.
- Bury, Rhiannon. 2005. Cyberspaces of Their Own: Female Fandoms Online. New York: Peter Lang.
- Busse, Kristina. 2006. "My Life is a WIP on My LJ Slashing the Slasher and the Reality of Celebrity and Internet Performance." In Fan Fiction and Fan Communities in the Age of the Internet, edited by Karen Hellekson and Kristina Busse, 207-224. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Busse, Kristina, and Alexis Lothian. 2009. "Bending Gender: Feminist and (Trans)Gender Discourses in the Changing Bodies of Slash Fanfiction." In Internet Fiction(s), edited by Ingrid Hotz-Davies, Anton Kirchhofer, and Sirpa Leppanen, 105-127. Cambridge: Cambridge Scholars Publishing.
- Butler, Judith. 1990. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. New York: Routledge.
- Caudill, Helen. 2003. "Tall, Dark, and Dangerous: Xena, the Quest, and the Wielding of Sexual Violence in Xena On-Line Fan Fiction." In Athena's Daughters: Television's New Women Warriors edited by Frances Early and Kathleen Kennedy, 27-39. Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press.

- Chen, Yaya and Yiqing Chen. 2007. "Lesbians in China's Mainland." Journal of Lesbian Studies, 10 (3-4): 113-125.
- Chou Chang Liao Wu Yi. 2009. "{YangShang} Plane Tree." FSCN, February 27. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/545687437?pn=1>
- Chou, Wah-Shan. 2001. "Homosexuality and the Cultural Politics of Tongzhi in China Societies." Journal of Homosexuality 40 (3/4): 27-46.
- Cohen, Cathy J.. 1999. "What Is This Movement Doing to My Politics?" Social Text, 17: 111-118.
- Coppa, Francesca. 2006. "A Brief History of Media Fandom." In Fan Fiction and Fan Communities in the Age of the Internet, edited by Karen Hellekson and Kristina Busse, 41-59. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- CO521. 2006. "{Jia Kong YangShang} Fei Se Shi." FSCN, November 14. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/147569899?pn=1>
- CO521. 2007. "{Jia Kong YangShang} Fei Se Shi." FSCN, November 26. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/147569899?pn=340>
- Couldry, Nick. 2000. Inside Culture: Re-Imagining the Method of Cultural Studies. London: Sage.
- Cui, Li, and Francis L.F. Lee. 2010. "Becoming Extra-Ordinary: Negotiation of Media Power in the Case of Super Girls' Voice in China." Popular Communication: the International Journal of Media and Culture 8 (4): 256-272.
- Doty, Alexander. 1993. Making Things Perfectly Queer. Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press.
- Driver, Susan. 2006. Queer Girls and Popular Culture: Reading, Resisting, and Creating Media. New York: Peter Lang.
- Dyer, Richard. 1986. Heavenly Bodies. New York: Saint Martin's.
- Dyer, Richard. 1998. Stars. London: British Film Institution.
- Dyer, Richard. 2006. "Stereotyping." In Media and Cultural Studies Key Works edited by Meenakshi Gigi Durham and Douglas M. Kellner, 353-365. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

- Engebreetsen, Elisabeth Lund. 2008. "Queer Ethnography in Theory and Practice: Reflections on Studying Sexual Globalization and Women's Queer Activism in Beijing." Graduate Journal of Social Science 5 (2): 88-116.
- Engebreetsen, Elisabeth Lund. 2009. "Intimate Practices, Conjugal Ideals: Affective Ties and Relationship Strategies among Lala (Lesbian) Women in Contemporary Beijing." Sexuality Research & Social Policy 6 (3): 3-14.
- Farrer, James. 2002. Opening Up: Youth Sex Culture and Market Reform in Shanghai. Chicago, IL: The University of Chicago Press.
- Fei Xue Bao Zi. 2006. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, August 13. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568?pn=15>
- Fei Xue Ji Di. 2006a. "[FeiXue Exclusive Pairing/XueFei Exclusive Pairing] The Summary of Gossip Materials about Na Li and Fei Xu." FSCN, August 29. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/102535402?pn=249>
- Fei Xue Ji Di. 2006b. "[FeiXue Exclusive Pairing/XueFei Exclusive Pairing] The Summary of Gossip Materials about Na Li and Fei Xu." FSCN, September 13. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/102535402?pn=249>
- Fei Yang Yi Xia. 2007. "{Chaotic CP} Every Lonely Flower." FSCN, July 10. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/225988441?pn=1>
- Feng Lai Feng Qu Yu Wu Hen. 2007. "[FeiXu] Shadow Gloom." FSCN, December 3. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/293660712?pn=1>
- FIRE1001. 2006. "[FeiXue Exclusive Pairing/XueFei Exclusive Pairing] The Summary of Gossip Materials about Na Li and Fei Xu." FSCN, August 29. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/102535402?pn=249>
- FIRE1001. 2007. "Tell Pure Fans, How to Differentiate X Haters Here." FSCN, June 1. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/207776234?pid=1948796690&cid=0#1948796690>
- Fiske, John. 1989. Reading the Popular. Boston, MA: Unwin Hyman.
- Fiske, Jone. 1992. "The Cultural Economy of Fandom." In Adoring Audience: Fan Culture and Popular Media, edited by Lisa A. Lewis, 30-49. New York: Routledge.
- Fiske, John. 1996. Media Matters: Race and Gender in U.S. Politics. Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press.

- Fiske, John. 2003. "Act Globally, Think Locally." In Planet TV: A Global Television Reader, edited by Lisa Parks and Shanti Kumar, 277-285.
- flysnowforever. 2006. "[FeiXue Exclusive Pairing/XueFei Exclusive Pairing] The Summary of Gossip Materials about Na Li and Fei Xu." FSCN, August 29. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/102535402?pn=249>
- Foucault, Michel. 1986. "Of Other Spaces: Utopias and Heterotopias." Diacritics 16: 22-27.
- Foucault, Michel. 1990. The History of Sexuality, Vol. I, An Introduction. Translated by Robert Hurkey. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- French, Howard W.. 2010. "Visibility of Gay People Reflects Changes in China." New York Times, September 1. <http://www.nytimes.com/2010/08/31/world/asia/31iht-letter.html>
- Friedman, Susan Stafford. 1998. Mappings: Feminism and the Cultural Geographies of Encounter. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Fu Huo YY. 2006. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, September 2. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/113685568?pn=27>
- Fu Huo YY. 2010. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, July 25. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568?pn=734>
- Fujimoto, Yukari. 1991. "The Meaning of 'Boys' Love' in Shojo Manga." New Feminism Review 2. http://matt-thorn.com/shoujo_manga/fujimoto.php
- Green, Shoshanna, Cynthia Jenkins, and Henry Jenkins. 1998. "Normal Female Interest in Men Bonking: Selections from The Terra Nostra Underground and Strange Bedfellows." In Theorizing Fandom: Fans, Subculture and Identity edited by Cheryl Harris and Alison Alexander, 9-38. Cresskill, New Jersey: Hampton Press INC.
- Gross, Larry. 2001. Up from Invisibility: Lesbians, Gay Men, and the Media in America. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Gross, Larry. 2003. "The Gay Global Village in Cyberspace." In Contesting Media Power: Alternative Media in a Networked World, edited by Nick Couldry and James Curran, 259-272. New York, NY: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
- Grossberg, Lawrence. 1984. "Anybody Boring Day in Paradise: Rock and Roll and the Empowerment of Everyday Life." Popular Music 4: 225-257.

- Halberstam, Judith. 1998. Female Masculinity. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Hamming, Jeanne E.. 2001. "Whatever Turns You on: Becoming-Lesbian and the Production of Desire in the Xenaverse." Genders 34.
http://www.genders.org/g34/g34_hamming.html
- Hanmer, Rosalind. 2010. "Internet Fandom, Queer Discourse, and Identities." In LGBT Identity and Online New Media, edited by Christopher Pullen and Margaret Cooper, 147-159. New York: Routledge.
- hannahmiller. 2009. "Supergirl: Baby Dykes in All Their Glory." City Weekend, March
 3. <http://www.cityweekend.com.cn/shanghai/articles/blogs-shanghai/lgbeat/supergirl-baby-dykes-in-all-their-glory/>
- Hayward, Susan. 2000. Cinema Studies: The Key Concepts. London: Routledge.
- Hinsch, Bret. 1990. Passions of the Cut Sleeve: The Male Homosexual Tradition in China. Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press.
- Holmes, Su. 2004. "'Reality Goes Pop!' Reality TV, Popular Music, and Narratives of Stardom in Pop Idol." Television & New Media 5 (2): 147-172.
- Jagose, Annanarie. 1996. Queer Theory. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press.
- Jeffreys, Elaine. 2006. Sex and Sexuality in China. New York: Routledge.
- Jenkins, Henry. 1992. Textual Poachers: Television Fans and Participatory Culture. New York: Routledge.
- Jenkins, Henry. 1994. "Star Trek Rerun, Reread, Rewritten: Fan Writing as Textual Poaching." In Television: The Critical View, edited by Horace Newcomb, 448-472. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jeppesen, Sandra. 2010. "Queer Anarchist Autonomous Zones and Publics: Direct Action Vomiting against Homonormative Consumerism." Sexualities 13 (4): 463-378.
- Jian Dan De Li Zi. 2006. "[YangShang/ShangYang] Are There More Sesames or More Chestnuts?" FSCN, October
 18. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/135579815?pid=5285317978&cid=0#5285317978>
- Jian, Miaoju, and Chang-de LIU. 2009. "'Democratic Entertainment' Commodity and

- Unpaid Labor of Reality TV: A Preliminary Analysis of China's Supergirl." Inter-Asia Cultural Studies 10 (4): 524-543.
- Jiao Shen Me Dou Shi Cuo. 2009a. "{ShangYang} Lure into Surrender." FSCN, December 24. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/686208383?pn=1>
- Jiao Shen Me Dou Shi Cuo. 2009b. "Lure into Surrender." FSCN, December 24, <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/686208383?pid=7135118489&cid=0#7135118489>
- Jones, Angela. 2009. "Queer Heterotopias: Homonormativity and the Future of Queerness." Interalia 4. http://www.interalia.org.pl/pl/artykuly/2009_4/13_queer_heterotopias_homonormativity_and_the_future_of_queerness.htm
- Jones, Sara Gwenllian. 2002. "The Sex Lives of Cult Television Characters." Screen 43 (1): 79-90.
- Jung, Susanne. 2004. "Queering Popular Culture: Female Spectators and the Appeal of Writing Slash Fan Fiction." Gender Forum Gender Queeries 8. <http://www.genderforum.org/fileadmin/archiv/genderforum/queer/jung.html>
- Keane, Michael. 2007. "Chinese Citizenship and Globalisation." In Globalisation and Citizenship: The Transnational Challenge, edited by Wayne Hudson and Steven Slaughter, 43-51. New York: Routledge.
- Kinsella, Sharon. 1998. "Japanese Subculture in the 1990s: Otaku and the Amateur Manga Movement." Journal of Japanese Studies 24 (2): 289-316.
- Kohnen, Melanie E.S.. 2008. "The Adventures of a Repressed Farm Boy and the Billionaire Who Loves Him: Queer Spectatorship in Smallville Fandom." In Teen Television: Essays on Programming and Fandom, edited by Sharon Marie Ross and Louisa Ellen Stein, 207-223. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Kreisinger, Elisa. 2012. "Queer Video Remix and LGBTQ Online Communities." Transformative Works and Cultures 9. <http://journal.transformativeworks.com/index.php/twc/issue/view/10>. doi: 10.3983/twc.2012.0395.
- Krentz, Jayne Ann. 1992. "Introduction." In Dangerous Men and Adventurous Women: Romance Writers on the Appeal of the Romance edited by Jayne Ann Krentz, 1-9. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Lamb, Patricia Frazer, and Diana L. Veith. 1986. "Romantic Myth, Transcendence, and Star Trek Zines." In Erotic Universe: Sexuality and Fantastic Literature,

- edited by Donald Palumbo, 235-255. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Lefebvre, Henri. 1992. The Production of Space. Oxford: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Letusgo. 2011. "The Understandings of and Differences between Yuri, GL, and Les." Les168, July 20. <http://www.les168.com/article-159-1.html>
- Levine, Elana. 2007. Wallowing in Sex: The New Sexual Culture of 1970s American Television. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Li, Cheuk Yin. 2011. "Queering Urban Popculture: Exploring Tactics in the Ho Denise Wan See (HOCC) Fandom in Hong Kong." Paper presented at the 1st Global Conference: Urban Popcultures, Prague, Czech Republic, March 8-10.
- Li, Cheuk Yin. 2012. "The Absence of Fan Activism in the Queer Fandom of Ho Denise Wan See (HOCC) in Hong Kong." Transformative Cultures and Works 10. <http://journal.transformativeworks.org/index.php/twc/article/view/325/286>. doi:10.3983/twc.2012.0325.
- Li, Yannan. 2009. "Japanese Boy-Love Manga and the Global Fandom: A Case Study of Chinese Female Readers." MA thesis, Indiana University-Purdue University.
- Liao Liao Ai Yang Shang. 2006. "[YangShang/ShangYang] Are There More Sesames or More Chestnuts?" FSCN, October 29. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/135579815?pid=1259972371&cid=0#1259972371>
- Lipton, Mark. 2008. "Queer Readings of Popular Culture: Searching [to] Out the Subtext." In Queer Youth Cultures, edited Susan Driver, 163-179. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.
- Liu, Jen-peng, and Naifei Ding. 2005. "Reticent Poetics, Queer Politics." Inter-Asia Cultural Studies 6 (1): 30-55.
- Liu Xu Piao Piao Fei Wu. 2007. "Starting a Post for Newbie." FSCN, October 28. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/280393240?pid=2780872529&cid=0#2780872529>
- Linz, Cathie. 1992. "Setting the State: Facts and Figures." In Dangerous Men and Adventurous Women: Romance Writers on the Appeal of the Romance edited by Jayne Ann Krentz, 11-14. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Lo, Malinda. 2006. "China's Super Girl Li Yuchun." AfterEllen, February 21. <http://www.afterellen.com/archive/ellen/People/2006/2/supergirl.html>.
- Lothian, Alexis. 2008. "Paper from Console-ing Passions." Queer Geek Theory, April

27. <http://queergeektheory.wordpress.com/2008/04/27/paper-from-console-ing-pas-sions/>

Lothian, Alexis, Kristina Busse, and Robin Anne Reid. 2007. "'Yearning Void and Infinite Potential': Online Slash Fandom as Queer Female Space." English Language Notes 45 (2): 103-111.

Ma Li Lian. Xiong Yong. 2009a. "{YangShang} Love Likes the Tides." FSCN, March 9. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/549666356?pn=1>

Ma Li Lian. Xiong Yong. 2009b. "{YangShang} Love Likes the Tides." FSCN, March 9. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/549666356?pid=5679707734&cid=0#5679707734>

Macey, David. 1993. The Lives of Michel Foucault. London: Hutchinson.

Marcus, George E.. 1995. "Ethnography in/off the World System: The Emergence of Multi-Sited Ethnography." Annual Review of Anthropology 24: 95-117.

McLelland, Mark. 2000a. "No Climax, No Point, No Meaning? Japanese Women's Boy-Love Sites." Journal of Communication Inquiry 24 (3): 274-291.

McLelland, Mark. 2000b. "The Love Between 'Beautiful Boys' in Japanese Women's Comics." Journal of Gender Studies 9 (1): 13-25.

McRobbie, Angela. 1984. "Dance and Social Fantasy." In Gender and Generation, edited by Angela McRobbie and Mica Nava, 130-161. London: Macmillan.

Meng, Bingchun. 2009. "Who Needs Democracy if We Can Pick Our Favorite Girl? Super Girl as Media Spectacle." Chinese Journal of Communication 2 (3): 257-272.

Modleski, Tania. 1982. Loving with a Vengeance: Mass Produced Fantasies for Women. Hamden, CT: Archon Books.

Muñoz, Jose Esteban. 1999. Disidentifications: Queer of Color and the Performance of Politics. Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press.

Na Bi forever. 2007. "Love Wrong, Wrong Love!" FSCN, January 29. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/164935213?pn=1>

Ndalianis, Angela. 2002. "Introduction." In Stars in Our Eyes: The Star Phenomenon in the contemporary Era edited by Angela Ndalianis and Charlotte Henry, vii-xvii. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

- Ng, Eve. 2008. "Reading the Romance of Fan Cultural Production: Music Videos of a Television Lesbian Couple." Popular Communication 6: 103-121.
- Niao Shan Ming De YS. 2007. "One Thousand Years Late." FSCN, April 25. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/194663453?pid=1820982502&cid=0#1820982502>
- Ning, Wang. 1997. "Orientalism versus Occidentalism?" New Literary History 28 (1): 57-67.
- Ogi, Fusami. 2001. "Beyond Shojo, Blending Gender: Subverting the Homogendered World in Shojo Manga (Japanese comics for Girls)." International Journal of Comic Art 3 (2): 151-161.
- Ouellette, Laurie, and Susan Murray. 2004. "Introduction." In Reality TV: Remaking Television Culture, edited by Laurie Ouellette and Susan Murray, 1-15. New York, NY: New York University Press.
- Palmer, Paulina. 1999. Lesbian Gothic. London: Cassell.
- Parameswaran, Radhika. 2002. "Reading Fictions of Romance: Gender, Sexuality, and Nationalism in Postcolonial India." Journal of Communication 52 (4): 832-851.
- Penley, Constance. 1991. "Brownian Motion: Women, Tactics, and Technology." In Technoculture, edited by Constance Penley and Andrew Ross, 135-161. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Penley, Constance. 1992. "Feminism, Psychoanalysis, and the Study of Popular Culture." In Cultural Studies, edited by Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler, 479-500. New York: Routledge.
- Penley, Constance. 1997. NASA/Trek Popular Science and Sex in America. New York: Verso.
- Perper, Timothy, and Martha Cornog. 2006. "In the Sound of the Bells: Freedom and Revolution in Revolutionary Girl Utena." Mechademia: An Annual Forum for Anime, Manga, and the Fan Arts, 1: 183-186.
- Phillips, Susan Elizabeth. 1992. "The Romance and the Empowerment of Women." In Dangerous Men and Adventurous Women: Romance Writers on the Appeal of the Romance edited by Jayne Ann Krentz, 53-59. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Pi Pi Xiao Luo Bo. 2009. "[YangShang/ShangYang] Are There More Sesames or

More Chestnuts?" FSCN, January

11. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/135579815?pid=5285317978&cid=0#5285317978>

Putney, Mary Jo. 1992. "Welcome to the Dark Side." In Dangerous Men and Adventurous Women: Romance Writers on the Appeal of the Romance edited by Jayne Ann Krentz, 99-106. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

QQ. 2009. "Video: The Real Scene in which Yike Zeng Kissed Chen Pan. The Real Reason for Breaking for Commercials." Last modified August 3. <http://ent.qq.com/a/20090803/000202.htm>

Quilligan, Maureen. 2005. Incest and Agency in Elizabeth's England. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Radway, Janice. 1991. Reading the Romance: Women, Patriarchy and Popular Literature. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press.

Rambukkana, Nathan. 2007. "Is Slash an Alternative Medium? 'Queer' Heterotopias and the Role of Autonomous Media Spaces in Radical World Building." Affinities 1 (1). <http://www.affinitiesjournal.org/index.php/affinities/article/view/8/42#43>

Reid, Robin Anne. 2009. "Thrusts in the Dark: Slashers' Queer Practices." Extrapolation 50 (3): 463-483.

Ren Jian FISH. 2006. "[FeiXue Exclusive Pairing/XueFei Exclusive Pairing] The Summary of Gossip Materials about Na Li and Fei Xu." FSCN, August 29. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/102535402?pn=249>

Rich, Adrienne. 1986. Blood, Bread and Poetry: Selected Prose, 1979-1985. New York: W. W. Norton.

Rojek, Chris. 2001. Celebrity. London: Reaktion.

Rubin, Gayle. 1984. "Thinking Sex: Notes for a Radical Theory of the Politics of Sexuality." In Pleasure and Danger: Exploring Female Sexuality edited by Carole S. Vance, 143-178. London: Pandora.

Russ, Joanna. 1985. Magic Mommas, Trembling Sisters, Puritans & Perverts: Feminist Essays. New York: The Crossing Press.

Russo, Julie Levin. 2002. "NEW VOY 'Cyborg Sex' J/7 [NC-17] 1/1" New Methodologies, New Fantasies." Accessed May 1, 2012. <http://j-l-r.org/asmic/fanfic/print/jlr-cyborgsex.pdf>.

- Russo, Julie Levin. 2007. "Hera Has Six Mommies (A Transmedia Love Story)." Flowtv, 7 (14). <http://flowtv.org/2007/12/hera-has-six-mommies-a-transmedia-love-story/>
- Russo, Julie Levin. 2009. "User-Penetrated Content: Fan Video in the Age of Convergence" Cinema Journal 48 (4): 125-130.
- San Shao Nai Nai De Shang Zi. 2007. "Peking Opera Blues." FSCN, January 27. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/166973394?pn=1>
- Sandvoss, Cornel. 2005. Fans: The Mirror of Consumption. Malden, MA: Polity Press.
- Saukko, Paula. 2003. Doing Research in Cultural Studies: An Introduction to Classical and New Methodological Approaches. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications.
- Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky. 1993. "Queer Performativity: Henry James's The Art of the Novel." GLQ 1 (2): 1-16.
- Seidel, Kathleen Gilles. 1992. "Judge Me by the Joy I Bring." In Dangerous Men and Adventurous Women: Romance Writers on the Appeal of the Romance edited by Jayne Ann Krentz, 159-180. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Shang Shu Fu Ge Ji. 2007. "Peking Opera Blues." FSCN, April 25. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/166973394?pn=193>
- Shi Jin Er Yao A. 2008. "No Angel." FSCN, June 8. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/f?kz=402949307>
- Sina 2007. "Xuan Xiu Duan Xin 'Xi Jin' Xiong Meng, 06 Chao Nv Duan Xin Shou ru 2000 Wan." Last modified May 24. <http://ent.sina.com.cn/s/m/2007-05-24/09381567465.html>
- Sohu. 2009. "'Gay Websites' Are Closed for Crackdown on Pornography, NGOs for 'the Prevention of AIDS' Are Complaining." Last modified December 29. <http://news.sohu.com/20091229/n269274374.shtml>
- Stacey, Jackie. 1991. "Feminine Fascinations: Forms of Identification in Star-Audience Relations." In Stardom: Industry of Desire, edited by Christine Gledhill, 141-163. London: Routledge.
- Tan, See Kam. 2011. "Global Hollywood, Narrative Transparency, and Chinese Media Poachers: Narrating Cross-Cultural negotiations of Friends in South China."

Television and New Media 12 (3): 207-227.

Turner, Graeme. 2004. Understanding Celebrity. London: Sage.

Wan, Yanhai. 2001. "Becoming a Gay Activist in Contemporary China." Journal of Homosexuality 40 (3-4): 47-64.

Wang Dao Zai Na. 2010. "A Building of Pictures of Guangzhou Fellow Student Liu." FSCN, July 25. <http://tieba.baidu.com/p/113685568?pn=734>

Wei, Wei. 2008. "Resistance in Dreaming: A Study of Chinese Online Boy's Love Fandom." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the International Communication Association, Montreal, Quebec, Canada, May 22.

Wekker, Gloria. 2006. The Politics of Passion: Women's Sexual Culture in the Afro-Surinamese Diaspora. New York: Columbia University Press.

Welker, James. 2006. "Beautiful, Borrowed, and Bent: 'Boy's Love' as Girls' Love in Shojo Manga." Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 31 (3): 841-870.

Woledge, Elizabeth. 2005. "From Slash to the Mainstream: Female Writers and Gender Blending Men." Extrapolation 46 (1): 50-65.

Woledge, Elizabeth. 2006. "Intimatopia: Genre Intersections Between Slash and the Mainstream." Fan Fiction and Fan Communities in the Age of the Internet, edited by Karen Hellekson and Kristina Busse, 97-114. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.

Wood, Andrea. 2006. "'Straight' Women, Queer Texts: Boy-Love Manga and the Rise of a Global Counterpublic." Women's Studies Quarterly 34 (1/2): 394-414.

Wu, Jin. 2003. "From 'Long Yang' and 'Dui Shi' to Tongzhi: Homosexuality in China." Journal of Gay & Lesbian Psychotherapy 7 (1/2): 117-143.

Xiao, Hui. 2006. "Narrating a Happy China through a Crying Game: A Case Study of Post-Mao Reality Shows." China Media Research 2 (3): 59-67.

Xue Bu Neng Bu Fei. 2008. "The Record of 621 Fei Xue Sharing a Stage." FSCN, June 22. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/415681281?pn=1>

xuxiaoduo77. 2009. "Please Read it Patiently, Thanks!" FSCN, July 25. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/615781732?pid=6373616301&cid=0#6373616301>

Yang, Ling. 2010. "'Bent' Romance: Super Girl Slash Literature, Women's Desires, and Feminism." Internet Culture and Literature

9. <http://wlwx.literature.org.cn/Article.aspx?ID=46197>

Yang, Ling, and Hongwei Bao. 2012. "Queerly Intimate: Friends, Fans and Affective Communication in a Super Girl Fan Fiction Community." Cultural Studies: 1-30. doi: 10.1080/09502386.2012.679286

Yardley, Jim. 2005. "The Chinese Get the Vote, if Only for 'Super Girl'." New York Times, September
4. <http://www.nytimes.com/2005/09/04/weekinreview/04yard.html>.

YS Bang Ming Bu Zhi Zhui Ming. 2006. "[Notice] The Records of Banned and Deleted IP, ID + Trash Can." FSCN, November
14. <http://tieba.FSCN.com/p/135632348?pid=1305139399&cid=0#1305139399>

Yue, Audrey, and Haiqing Yu. 2008. "China's Super Girl: Mobile Youth Cultures and New Sexualities." In Youth, Media and Culture in the Asia Pacific Region, edited Usha M Rodrigues and Belinda Smaill, 117-134. Newcastle, UK: Cambridge Scholars Publishing.

Zhang, Weidong. 2009. "Crime, Disease, Sex, and Abnormal Love: Sexual Minorities under Dominant Gaze in Chinese Media." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the International Communication Association, Sheraton New York, New York City, NY, May 25.