TRAIL MIX

by

Franklin K.R. Cline

A Dissertation Submitted in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy

in English

at
The University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

May 2019
ABSTRACT

TRAIL MIX

by

Franklin K.R. Cline

The University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2019
Under the Supervision of Professor Brenda Cárdenas

Trail Mix is a book of poems comprised of two sequences: “Trail Mix,” which considers the fact and aftermath of the Trail of Tears and “Red Dead Redemptions,” which utilizes the lyric narrative to consider contemporary mixedblood life. The two sequences comprising Trail Mix harmonize in dissonance: “Trail Mix” is serious, “Red Dead Redemptions” slightly playful; “Trail Mix” is historically entrenched, “Red Dead Redemptions” documents the unspooling present moment. Both interrogate what it might mean to be Cherokee. Aesthetically, the poems in the “Trail Mix” section have more movement and white space, which aligns with a major theme in the section: walking. The poems in “Red Dead Redemptions” are tighter, with less white space, reflecting the immediacy of the present moment in which they take place. Together, the sections strive to comprise a complex vision of Cherokee postindian life and thought.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Content</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>Fragment, Polyvocality, Dissonance, and the Lyric: A Critical Introduction to Trail Mix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>Trail Mix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>79</td>
<td>Curriculum Vitae</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The following poems have been previously published in these corresponding editions of literary journals and anthologies:

“Ballgame,” Yellow Medicine Review, forthcoming

“Walk,” Dreginald, forthcoming

“The Ease and Difficulty of Hating and Loving One’s Self,” Science-Based Vulnerability: Scientists and Poets #Resist, forthcoming Fragment, Polyvocality, Dissonance, and the Lyric: A Critical Introduction to Trail Mix

My creative dissertation Trail Mix is composed of two long sequences, “Trail Mix” and “Red Dead Redemptions,” both of which examine indigenous history, attitudes, and the integration of non-Native or Eurowestern (to borrow a word from Chadwick Allen) lifestyles into Native-American communities. More specifically, the collection is interested in Cherokee history, cosmology, and present living, and draws especially upon the critical and historical work of Cherokee scholars such as Daniel Heath Justice and John Ehle. The two sequences—“Trail Mix” and “Red Dead Redemptions”—work in varying aesthetic, tonal, and rhetorical modes according to their emphases: “Trail Mix” is a polyvocal examination of the impacts of the Trail of Tears and its aftermath, whereas “Red Dead Redemptions” is a series of lyric narrative poems based entirely in the present day. Together, the poems seek to query the legacy of the Cherokee and what it might mean to be, as the author is, a white-passing mixedblood Cherokee in 2019. Drawing upon the legacy of Native poets such as Simon J. Ortiz and Adrian C. Louis, the influence of contemporary Native poets like Tommy Pico and Laura Da’, and the New York School of poets, particularly Frank O’Hara, Trail Mix employs fragment, polyvocality, dissonance, and the lyric to present a complex and lively portrait of the Cherokee experience.

“Trail Mix” moves in fragments and breaths, echoing the poet’s ancestors’ journey. (Here, it is important to point out that while Trail Mix refers to the dissertation in its entirety, “Trail Mix” references the first sequence of poems.) “Trail Mix” follows a loose anti-timeline that includes the signing of the Treaty of New Echota in 1835, the majority of Cherokees’ resistance to the relocation required by the Treaty, the walk on the Trail itself, the landgrab that followed, and present-day impacts. The “human vultures”—as John Ehle
(a 6th generation North Carolinian Cherokee descendent) describes the soldiers in his important work, Trail of Tears: The Rise and Fall of the Cherokee Nation—are therein depicted as a metonymy of settler colonialism (Ehle 330). However, to reflect my own biracial identity—which is more fully explored in the second half of the dissertation—occasionally the Cherokee themselves are presented as feet and hands; the members of the Army responsible for the push are typically depicted as shoes or arms. The use of metonymy is a mild nod to Simon J. Ortiz's from Sand Creek, a book-length poem that considers the massacre and driving out of “about 600 Cheyenne and Arapaho people” and that returns to the tongue across the book as an image for Native expression (Ortiz 8).

While this dissertation diverges from Ortiz's focused examination of that particular mass removal—or other book-length considerations of Native life and/or government imbued terrors such as N. Scott Momaday’s The Way to Rainy Mountain and Valerie Martinez’s Each and Her—the “Trail Mix” sequence seeks to maintain the velocity of poems in sequence established by those texts.

At the conclusion of the essay “Dreams in the Fourth Dimension” in his book The Everlasting Sky, Gerald Vizenor notes:

> the expression of oshki anishinabe visual experiences is presented in many different literary forms—the anecdotal and archetypal stories from the collective unconscious of the tribal past, the sermon of conscious and identity, the stories of folly, short narrations of humorous and tragic incidents, the epistle, poetry, the novel and the short story (79).

While Vizenor is speaking from an Ojibwe perspective, it is important to utilize the transindigenous methodology employed by Chadwick Allen in his book Transindigineous: Methodologies for Global Native Literary Studies, in which he argues for “making... productive tensions” across Nations in order to understand vital connections for the monolithic and oft-misunderstood concept of indigeneity (Allen xxi, xxii). For instance, one frequently comes across instances in pop culture in which a generic Native American mythology permeates an object or space, as opposed to speaking specifically with regards to a particular Nation’s mythology, ceremonies, or sacred spaces. Hence, I feel comfortable utilizing Vizenor’s Ojibwe understanding of presentation for the dissertation’s Cherokee history, as it permeates our own history and my indigenous poetics. “Trail Mix” presents “the collective anecdotal from the tribal past” alongside the poet’s own experience of the present to form a collective picture of the strange pain brought about by the Trail of Tears (Vizenor 79).

“Trail Mix” also features two persona poems—one sonnet, and one longer piece—that seek to interrogate two major, polarizing figures in the Cherokee Nation: Sequoyah (a.k.a. George Guess) and Elias Boudinot. These poems provide further depth of voice and tone to an already vocally and tonally variegated sequence. Sequoyah’s poem—“Sequoyah”—is a sonnet in keeping with his perceived capitulation to settler colonial ideals vis a vis the finalizing and recording of a written Cherokee syllabary. In her illuminating text Signs of Cherokee Culture: Sequoyah’s Syllabary in Eastern Cherokee Life, Margaret Bender argues that “Sequoyah was not an assimilationist; the sketchy data available about him suggests that he disliked the changes whites and some Cherokees were trying to bring about in Cherokee society and felt that his system could be used to make the Cherokees more independent of whites” (35).
In “Sequoyah,” then, I strive to play with language, drawing upon Sequoyah’s construction of the Cherokee language, and portray a human who is more protective of his community than is often depicted, though Grant Foreman’s early 1940’s biography certainly paints a picture of a man working to preserve his culture in spite of ostensible capitulation. The short poem pokes at the inexact perceptions of Sequoyah as overly compliant with settler colonists and seeks to acknowledge the beauty of Sequoyah’s syllabary and, more largely, his overall vitality to the construction and preservation of the Cherokee language.

“Extra Extra,” a longer poem in the voice of Elias Boudinot, is more complicated, as is the subject of the poem himself. On one hand, he was part of the illicit (though quorum-meeting) group of Cherokee who absconded north to sign the Treaty of New Echota, effectively putting into practice the horrific machinations of the Trail of Tears two years later. On the other hand, he also worked as an advocate for the Cherokee amongst settler colonials and established the Cherokee Phoenix, which remains the longest-running indigenous newspaper in the United States. In this poem, Boudinot acknowledges his complicity while also upholding his superlative work for preserving Cherokee history. The poem also considers his murder by fellow Cherokee on Saturday, June 22, 1839, as he was building his new home just north of Talequah, and his legacy (Luebke 137). In a nod to the long history of collage in United Statesian socially conscious political poetry, from Charles Reznikoff and Muriel Rukeyser to contemporary poets such as Douglas Kearney and Mark Novak, the poem also samples Boudinot’s well-known speech “An Address to the Whites.” Ultimately, this poem is not seeking to herald Boudinot so much as to attempt to understand the mindset of a complicated individual who made vital choices on behalf of our Nation and crucially shaped its future.

Another vital aspect of “Trail Mix,” in addition to polyvocality, is that of fragment and disjunctive grammar. Many of the poems contain long pauses, spaces, or gaps, wherein the reader may feel confused or conflicted about a straightforward, intended meaning. This occurs for a variety of reasons—I would argue, for instance, that polyvocality within a single poem lends itself to fragment as the transitions from one voice to another are often jagged and unpredictable—but I would be remiss not to mention the influence of contemporary Chamorro poet Craig Santos Perez, his long multi-volume poem from Unincorporated Territory, and his indelible use of fragment.

from UNINCORPORATED TERRITORY, as it stands, is an ongoing poem of protest, four books released thus far, that will continue as long as Guåhan (the Chamorro word for Guam) continues its bizarre existence as a United States territory whose inhabitants do not have many of the basic rights or economic benefits of U.S. citizens living in fully incorporated states. As Tiara R. Na’puti puts it in her article “Speaking the Language of Peace: Chamoru Resistance and Rhetoric in Guåhan’s Self-Determination Movement”:

Guåhan is afforded a political status that can be characterized as both/neither. Guåhan is represented as “both” a political landmass with citizenship status afforded to the inhabitants and a government with local elections and a delegate in the U.S. House of Representatives. Yet it is also characterized as “neither,” because the U.S. citizenship rights granted to Guåhan’s inhabitants are not full citizenship rights in practice... (302).
This “both/neither” status might explain some of Perez’s obsession with “from” or “ginen” in Chamorro. Within each book, and across the longer project, Perez has placed multiple series of poems, which he has broken up and interwoven throughout each book. The various poem series each have their own title, and many of these titles begin with "ginen”—“from,” in English—such as “ginen tidelands” or “ginen ta(la)ya.” So there is ostensibly a “tidelands” poem that is (or will be) complete, somewhere, and the books only present fragments from the work in its ongoing totality. This division, interweaving, and focus on fromness accomplishes multiple objectives: it conjures an impossible place in which all of these poems are collected, as if all of the fragments we receive are transmissions. But it also insists upon a home, a definite starting point, a place of origin. It blatantly flaunts the “both/neither” status and simply is. “Trail Mix,” relatedly, considers notions of fromness via atemporality and multiangularity, and considers the ways in which relocation has produced its own “both/neither” status for many Cherokee, myself included, over several generations. Ultimately, “Trail Mix” seeks, through polyvocality and fragment, to discover and wrestle with the permutations and ramifications of the Trail of Tears, in aesthetic and rhetorical modes indebted to the ways in which Perez considers the impact of settler colonialism on the Chamorro.

“Trail Mix” does not portend to be an historical record or to speak on behalf of anyone—despite its delving into persona poems and the voices of ancestors, which are imagined—but rather to be a part of the continued exploration of relocation’s impact. In this, it reflects important novels about the Trail of Tears such as, but not limited to, Pushing the Bear by Diane Glancy, Mountain Windsong by Robert J. Conley, and more recently, Riding the Trail of Tears by Blake M. Hausman. In this regard, “Trail Mix” maintains the ongoing creative and critical conversation regarding the effects of forced relocation amongst the Cherokee.

The second half of the dissertation, “Red Dead Redemptions,” is comprised of a series of lyric narrative poems written in the wake of and influenced by vital indigenous poets such as Joy Harjo, Carter Rivard, Adrian C. Louis, and Leslie Marmon Silko. These poems interrogate the author’s own privilege and the peculiar diaspora of the “postindian” (to borrow another term from Vizenor). In Manifest Manners, Vizenor writes that the postindian “resumes the ontic significance of native modernity. Postindians are the new stories of conversions and survivance; the tricky observance of native stories in the associated context of postmodernity” (Vizenor viii). “Red Dead Redemptions” seeks to represent, complicate, and provide a lyrical voice to the postindian experience.

In her essay “The Possibilities of a Native Poetics,” published in the anthology Nothing But The Truth, Kimberly Blaeser discusses the ways in which the poems contained therein are “engaged in framing a response to the perceived expectations of Native American Literature” (414). She goes on to consider the “continuities” of Native poetry and the ways in which “the poems carry history, and therefore perspective, into their encounters with language and life. They also carry the will to survive. Perhaps the most significant facet of a Native Poetics involves the impetus to rise off the page, to teach, to incite continuance” (414-5). This adheres to both my view of Native Poetics—to borrow her phrase—and also to the work “Red Dead Redemptions” is performing. By utilizing contemporary, accessible vernacular, these poems are accessible to a non-Native audience while simultaneously operating for—albeit, carefully, not on behalf of—a Native, and more specifically, a mixedblood Cherokee readership.

The poems in “Red Dead Redemption” function within a Cherokee literary lineage identified by both non-Native scholars and the contemporary Cherokee literary critic Daniel Heath Justice, whose work has been key to the construction of this dissertation. In their interesting but problematic 1965 collection, Walk in your Soul: Love Incantations of the Oklahoma Cherokee, Jack Frederick Kilpatrick and Anna Gritts Kilpatrick serve as settler colonial voyeurs for Cherokee love poems and Cherokee poetry by and large. Their translations are mostly uninteresting, but the introduction provides a few helpful phraseologies for reading the “Red Dead Redemption” section, most notably that there are “certain phraseological ritualisms that are liberally strewn throughout all Cherokee Magic. Every action transpires ‘quickly’ or ‘very quickly’” (7). “Red Dead Redemptions” is especially attentive to those “phraseological ritualisms” that might permeate United Statesian colloquialisms, thus maintaining, or codifying, a postindian mode of Native poetry that acknowledges the creative debt the poet has to United Statesian culture.

The poems in “Red Dead Redemptions” are also interested specifically in the lyric narrative tradition and in cultivating a dialogic methodology between reader and writer, or possibly between the reader and the book itself, which will be discussed later. Drawing on New York School poet Frank O'Hara’s poetics and specifically his tongue-in-cheek essay “Personism,” in which he discusses his realization that, while writing a poem for a person he was in love with, he could have “use[d] the telephone instead of writing the poem, and so Personism was born... [Personism] puts the poem between the poet and person, Lucky Pierre style, and the poem is gratified. The poem is at last between two persons instead of between two pages” (O’Hara 442). The immediacy and graspability of thought and experience, and the transfer thereof via verse, is vital to the “Red Dead Redemptions” sequence, as it works in a steadfast, talky rhetoric to communicate intimate thoughts and experiences, drawing specifically on O’Hara’s style—and the New York School style in general—and Personism. The poems also emulate O’Hara’s subtle irony and genuine, though extremely complicated, love of the United States and its popular culture.

One O’Hara poem to which I often return, and from which I’ve drawn, is “Having a Coke with You.” Published towards the end of his life, the poem works in anaphora, repeating “perhaps” four times to begin four lines towards the beginning of the poem, and using “and” repeatedly to conjure the breathlessness of love. The title, which refers to a popular advertisement for Coca-Cola, reflects O’Hara’s—and the New York School’s—mobilization of the insidious earworm of popular culture reframed within a context of poetry, which is too frequently perceived in the mainstream as a gilded artform. Seemingly paradoxically, sitting alongside pop culture references and immediately graspable language are these lines, which conclude the first stanza:

it is hard to believe when I’m with you that there can be anything as still as solemn as unpleasantly definitive as statuary when right in front of it in the warm New York 4 o’clock light we are drifting back and forth between each other like a tree breathing through its spectacles (O’Hara 262).

This is a potent and moving shift into the high lyric, and when juxtaposed with both the vernacular and then-contemporary immediacy of the rest of the verse, heightens and troubles the poem’s rhetorical consideration of love, and tramples any question of irony. I prize the sincerity of this poem and the ways in which O’Hara turns a love poem into a cultural collage of sorts, while still remaining subtly aware of the ways in which his affection for the addressee of the poem is subject to being warped by United Statesian popular culture. The poems in “Red Dead Redemptions” query that relationship by unironically making reference to our current American moment—the name is a pun upon the popular Western video game series starring cowboys and featuring a handful of occasional token Indians—while attempting to both complicate those references and employ them to situate the poet as a product of this moment.

However, as I am an indigenous poet, the question of my poetry’s complicity in a pernicious settler-state culture must be considered. Though it is an extremely difficult question that will take a lifetime (and an oeuvre!) to explore in enough depth to answer, it’s vital to consider how, specifically, indigenous folks can move comfortably in urban settings. Set on the south side of Chicago, Theodore Van Alst’s gritty collection of short stories Sacred Smokes provides a compelling portrait of the anger and sadness permeating the urban Indian experience. For Van Alst, and for many of the poems in “Red Dead Redemptions”—most notably “Myth,” which was shaped in part by Van Alst’s tales of youthful, hedonistic indiscretions—this disaporic feeling manifests (no pun intended) itself in acts of rebellion that mostly add up to petty crimes, but can dangerously snowball into dodgy, seriously criminal acts. In light of this, then, for the purposes of this introduction, perhaps the question we should be asking is how can indigenous poets decolonize—a messy and complicated word—contemporary United Statesian poetry, while still acknowledging there are some phenomenal and influential non-Native poets from whom we have much to learn? How do we work to indigenize—perhaps a more exact word than decolonize—the rhetorical style of the New York School, or the messy and playful disruption provided by the L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E poets?

Perhaps one model to whom we can turn is that of Lynn Riggs, who is discussed at length in Daniel Heath Justice’s Our Fire Survives the Storm: A Cherokee Literary History. Justice writes:

> As an outland Cherokee far from the land base of the Nation, a gay man in the first half of the twentieth century, and an Oklahoman self-exiled to the artistic centers of the United States...Riggs experienced multiple levels of dispossession: from his homeland in Indian Territory/Oklahoma; from the Cherokee Community and its traditions and, ultimately, from himself (94).

Riggs provides an interesting early model for Cherokee like me, operating as an Oklahoma Indian far removed from Oklahoma, and still suffering under various Eurowestern societal realms that “sanction what an Indian can say” (Justice 94-95). Justice goes on to describe Riggs’ play, The Cherokee Night, as having an “overwhelming tone... of moderated despair” (103). And while The Cherokee Night deals predominately in anti-allotment arguments—the idea being that allotments would destroy kinship and encourage assimilation—“Red Dead Redemptions” deals with many of the other themes present in the play, such as that of a mixedblood questioning his place within his Nation—a consistent theme in contemporary Native American literature and criticism—and that of skin color and its importance to how the artist is racially perceived. Justice concludes his section on Riggs by noting “the allotment dispossession of the Cherokees of Indian Territory clearly shaped the course of Lynn Riggs’s life, just as it continues to impact many Cherokees today and our relationships to our communities, tribal connections, and cultural responsibilities"
One overarching question “Red Dead Redemptions” poses is “what do we do now that we have wound up spread across the United States, many of us (myself included) learning the old myths and legends from books—often recorded by non-Native anthropologists?” “Red Dead Redemptions” examines the odd physical and existential diaspora of the contemporary mixedblood and could only exist due to work by influential writers such as Lynn Riggs.

Another manner by which “Red Dead Redemptions” practices survivance is via its use of humor, specifically what Vine Deloria, Jr. termed “Indian Humor” in his book Custer Died For Your Sins. Indian humor, which Robert J. Conley notes is “a disguise for the profound,” establishes a still-here mentality and a reminder that United States history actively and perniciously works to erase the Native experience (Conley 109). It also seeks to remind Natives that we still possess varying forms of power, specifically those centering around orality: “the liberty to cruelly degrade,” Mikhail Bahktin writes, is a potent one (qtd. in Owens, 226). Deloria notes that, within United Statesian popular culture, the figure of the Indian is played as stoic, silent, and serious, an observation echoed by Dean Rader and Daniel Heath Justice. Of course, Deloria observes, “the Indian people are exactly opposite of [that] popular stereotype.” (146). I concur with Deloria’s statement and believe that one vital manner of breaking down that stereotype is through a resigned playfulness that strikes me as uniquely indigenous.

In this, then, it follows that “Red Dead Redemptions” owes a great rhetorical debt to the late Adrian C. Louis, whose dry and sardonic poems, especially those in Vortex of Indian Fevers, many consisting of the poet performing ostensibly uninteresting activities such as going to the grocery store or watching football, were and remain formative for me. His poem “The Fine Print on a Label of a Bottle of Non-Alcohol Beer,” which is my favorite poem of all time, particularly influenced the arc of many poems in “Red Dead Redemptions,” especially through the ways in which Louis masterfully runs an emotional gamut from humor that contains both Indian and universal tenants which are at turns emotive, wistful, and/or empowering in a mere 20 lines.

Louis’ poem begins “The Chiefs are winning / and I’m on the couch waiting / for the second half of their grunt tussle against the Redskins to begin” (Louis 33). Using accessible language, Louis acknowledges the ways in which Native avatars infiltrate even the most banal aspects of United Statesian culture, while also hinting at the history of intertribal warfare by having the Chiefs fight the Redskins—two teams who, in theory, should be on the same side. The poem continues by examining his struggles with sobriety, concluding with a lengthy direct address consisting of an indigenization of the titular label’s copy:

  my brother,

  you are pouring this illusion

  down your throat

  because you are an alcoholic child of alcoholic parents and they were the alcoholic children of your alcoholic grandparents (Louis 33).

In addition to addressing the larger and more troublesome frequency of Native alcoholism—a point to which “Red Dead Redemptions” speaks as well—Louis here is imagining a world in which branding is, if not decolonized, then at least made more Native, which draws, in my mind, a direct line to O’Hara’s “Having a Coke with You,” with O’Hara’s Coca-Cola replaced by a non-alcoholic beer. The poem continues to speak in the voice of the hallucinatory indigenous label and concludes by acknowledging the large and upsetting history of Native struggles with addiction: “...days before your people / learned how to hotwire the Great Spirit with chemical prayers” (Louis 34). There is certainly Indian humor present here via the protective irony within the paradox of “chemical prayers,” but sitting between those lines’ difficult playfulness is a painful truth about the dangers of settler colonialism, here represented through the jeopardies of intoxicants but easily extended into the larger menaces of inculcation to United Statesian modes of living and thinking.

Another poem from which I’ve drawn deeply is Laura Da’s “Passive Voice” from her 2015 collection Tributaries. The poem begins with pedagogy, the poet speaking of how she’s used “a trick to teach students / how to avoid passive voice” (14). This trick is to add the phrase “by zombies” after each verb—if the phrase fits, then the sentence is in the passive. It’s a clever teacherly trick, but nowhere near as brilliant as the leap Da’ takes thereafter, in which she pontificates upon what her students—whose racial makeup is never made clear—may think as their summer vacation family trips inevitably move them past “historical marker[s] [that] beckon them to the / site of an Indian village” (ibid.). She concludes the poem with a chilling sextet imagining their imagination of the Indian village:

Riveted bramble of passive verbs etched in wood—stripped hands
breaking up from the dry ground to pinch the meat
of their young red tongues (ibid).
Da’s poem begins playfully with a fun anecdote about how to teach a specific aspect of syntax and ends by winding that aspect of syntax into the larger history of the eradication of Natives and our voices. Whenever I read it, I like to imagine hearing it aloud: the laughs of the crowd at the initial three stanzas squashed by the scale and earnestness of the poem’s powerful and painful ending; I cannot think of the strange and potent connection between relocation and the passive voice without feeling a deep tug in my guts.

Louis’ and Da’s poems in general, and these two in particular, coincide with the facet of my poetics that believes the strongest poems are the ones that manage to hit a variety of emotional notes on the heart’s scale, and I have attempted to utilize that belief more specifically in “Red Dead Redemptions,” which is quite a bit more lighthearted than “Trail Mix.” I could point to, and write at length about, many Native writers and poems who succeed in thoroughly navigating the emotional spectrum—Joy Harjo’s “She Had Some Horses,” Gerald Vizenor’s Bearheart: The Heirship Chronicles, Santee Frazier’s Dark Thirty, Deb Miranda’s Bad Indians, “The Legend of Juan Malo” sequence that runs across [guma] and [lukao] in Craig Santos Perez’s from Unincorporated Territory—but the writer to whom I most return, and am most tonally indebted, is Adrian C. Louis.

These observations regarding tone apply to entire books as well. There should be even more modulation across a collection. And while not every poem can have moments of both levity and sadness, there can still be minor, albeit key, tonal shifts that allow the poem to be more expansive and, thereby, to operate with greater power.

Of course, the poems in “Red Dead Redemption,” with a handful of exceptions, operate fairly straightforwardly in the lyric narrative, as opposed to the more fragmented or gap-filled poems that “Trail Mix” features. The lyric narrative is the chosen poetic mode for this section not only because O’Hara and Louis and Da’ do it so well and I’ve internalized their styles, but also because there is an immediacy and vibrancy to the lyric that successfully humanizes the poet, and given that non-Native readers can be given to extremely stereotypical (and inexact) preconceived notions about what Native poetry might look and sound like and what subjects, themes, and issues it might express, the lyric might also break down those notions and widen readers’ perceptions of what “Native American poetry” might consist of. Heid E. Erdrich observes in the introduction to New Poets of Native Nations, which she also edited:

unless our poetry conforms to some stereotypical notion of Native American history and culture in the past or unless it depicts spiritual relationship to the natural world of animals and plants and landscape, it goes unrecognized. We do and we do not write of treaties, battles, and drums. We do and we do not write about eagles, spirits, and canyons. Native poetry may be those things, but it is not only those things. It is also about grass and apologies, bones and joy, marching bands and genocide, skin and social work, and much more. But who would know? (xiv)

Erdrich’s point is an important one for 21st Century poetics to bear in mind, and the poems in “Red Dead Redemptions,” in the ways in which they depict a Native speaker performing the same tasks and having the same life experiences as non-Native folks, not only reifies the fact that Native folks are still around—and not just in museums!—but that we attend weddings and eat frozen pizzas, too. To paint a portrait of the contemporary urban Indian is to point at a certain assimilation that has its benefits and drawbacks. The subject of audience is always a tricky one; I find myself drawn to the idea that “Trail Mix” is written more specifically for a Cherokee audience, or folks that are versed in Cherokee history, while “Red Dead Redemptions” seeks a wider audience who can recognize different facets of themselves in the poems.

This observation begets the larger question of how “Trail Mix” and “Red Dead Redemptions” specifically fit together as two long sequences in the same manuscript. I’ve covered the former’s emphasis on the ramifications of the past and the latter’s emphasis on the present day (while still not ignoring those ramifications). The two sequences speak to each other and provide a larger and more complex portrait of postindian Cherokee survivance than if either section were lengthened into its own book-length manuscript in which the conceits would be pushed to a breaking point. While my dissertation is bound by Microsoft Word to present the two sections in a linear fashion, my vision for the published version of the manuscript is quite different. “Trail Mix” and “Red Dead Redemptions” will begin at separate ends of the book and meet in the middle. The reader will have to flip the book 180 degrees towards themselves to read the second sequence; the poems “Creation,” which ends “Trail Mix,” and “Goodbye,” which ends “Red Dead Redemptions,” will be side-by-side, but moving down the page in opposite directions. Each of the two sequences will feature different covers drawn by different artists, and blurbs will be placed on the inside front cover in a subtle homage to Deb Miranda’s playful blood quantum-based art on the inside of her memoir Bad Indians.

My rationale for this construction draws largely upon several analyses undertaken in Dean Rader’s highly influential critical work Engaged Resistance: American Art, Literature, and Film from Alcatraz to the NMAI. While discussing Edgar Heap of Birds’ Ocmulgee Sign Project, in which Heap of Birds audaciously and comically indigenizes the bureaucratic aesthetic and language of governmental street signage—e.g. a highway sign that might look like it will tell a driver how far from New York she is instead lists purchased, stolen, and reclaimed as mile markers—Rader notes that Heap of Birds’ projects “establish a dialogue between the lexical and the visual, the connotative and the denotative” (201-202). The construction of Trail Mix, holistically, aims to take the book—typically considered conceptually lexical and denotative—and bring in the visual and connotative aspects, via the necessitated interaction between reader and book through its designed circularity.

Upon my invitation as a fellow to the National Museum of the American Indian in the spring of 2018 to study for a weekend under Brenda J. Childs, I was struck by the design of NMAI: how it spiraled up, how its space was so open and inviting. Rader gives voice to this, citing its “architecture of compositional resistance” (212). Rader continually refers to the circularity—his word—of both the external and internal design of the building, and the ways in which that befits a curatorial invitation that adheres to that of many Nations—a transindigenous aesthetic—while opening itself up to non-Native visitors as well. This adheres to the project of Trail Mix’s design: to do something intriguing, iconoclastic, and indigenous with a reified concept, be it the museum in the NMAI’s case, or the book in mine.

Alongside the sequences’ eventual published format, many poems within complement each other in their use of the sonnet. It’s no secret the sonnet is virtually genetic amongst Eurowestern writers, but I’m more interested in playing with the received form, turning it upside down and seeing what comes out of its pockets. In this, I’m beholden to Robert Lowell, whose Notebook, while still predominantly adhering to meter and rhyme, aggressively shakes up content and often features strange juxtapositions or nonlinearities atypical of the form, and to Terrance Hayes, whose American Sonnets for my Past and Future Assassin not only plays with non-rhymed and unmetered poems, but also works in titular anaphora in its repetition of titles, as Trail Mix does. I’ve chosen the sonnet as a form to return to and to subtly bury (there are several sonnets in the manuscript), as I’m devoted to making a mess of reified Eurowestern forms. In this, I consider Linda Hogan’s prose piece “Sonnet,” first published in 1980 in Frontiers: A Journal of Women Studies, to be foundational: as a story of a young woman striving to break away from patriarchal traditions, there is no mention of writing, poetry, or sonnets. “Sonnet” consists of 39 paragraphs spread across 10 sections; there is no 14 to be found, and certainly no meter or rhyme. It is in prose! The piece brilliantly begs the question: is it a sonnet because Hogan has labeled it as such? Or at all? Is the title ironic? Is the story of the protagonist, Meg, and her struggles between love and exhaustion from and for men a replication of Hogan’s own trials with received Eurowestern forms, in a commentary upon how form can both free and constrain at once? The story offers no answers for its title and is truly puzzling; the prose itself is enigmatic and powerful, typical of Hogan’s compelling writing, but the title remains a huge and beautiful question that draws me in again and again for an answer both present and not, like a word on the tip of your tongue that you can’t quite derive. My rationale for using sonnets is not so grandiose, but rather to invite a reader to reconsider—if they even notice in the first place, as only one is labeled—what we think about when we think about the sonnet, and what it might mean for a Native poet to enter into the hifalutin world of formal poetry.

Ultimately, the two sequences of Trail Mix harmonize in dissonance: “Trail Mix” is serious, “Red Dead Redemptions” slightly playful; “Trail Mix” is historically entrenched, “Red Dead Redemptions” documents the unspooling present moment. Both interrogate what it might mean to be Cherokee. Aesthetically, the poems in the “Trail Mix” section have more movement and white space, which aligns with a major theme in the section: walking. The poems in “Red Dead Redemptions” are tighter, with less white space, reflecting the immediacy of the present moment in which they take place. Together, the sections strive to comprise a complex vision of Cherokee postindian life and thought.
WORKS CITED

TRAIL MIX
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>TRAIL MIX</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>MYTH</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>POEM FROM THE IMAGINED PERSPECTIVE OF OUR TRUMP VOTING COUSIN</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK (vocabulary lesson)</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>POEM WRITTEN WHILE WATCHING SAW III</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MYTH</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>neither MORE DRUMS nor REALIZATIONS</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EXTRA EXTRA: AN ADDRESS TO US</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SEQUOYAH</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GROCERY STORY</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COMFORT</td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DO THE RIGHT THING</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MUSEUM PLACARD FOR AN EASTERN BAND CHEROKEE BALL STICK FROM THE 19TH</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CENTURY</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MYTH</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CREATION</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>RED DEAD REDEMPTIONS</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>THE NATIONAL ANTHEM</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A SEARCHING AND FEARLESS MORAL INVENTORY</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>COLONIZATION BROUGHT ME GIN</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IT HAS TO GO SOMEWHERE</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECHOLOCATIONS</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BALLGAME</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VISITING THE MILWAUKEE PUBLIC MUSEUM WITH SHANAE</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SEEING RED</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WALK</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AMERICAN CHEROKEE</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MYTH IN WHICH THE LAST WORD IS EVERYTHING</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE NEXT</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WON'T GET FOOLED AGAIN</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECHOLOCATIONS PART II</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HAVE MERCY</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE EASE AND DIFFICULTY OF HATING AND LOVING ONE’S SELF</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ANOTHER DRUNK INDIAN POEM</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I HAVE THINGS THAT HAPPENED IN MY LIFE THAT THERE IS NO RECORD OF</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GOODBYE</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

24
TRAIL MIX

Wado, Prez Jackson, old fool! Did you know westward was the direction taken by the spirits of the dead?

-Brandon Hobson, “How Tsala Entered the Spirit World and Became a Hawk” MYTH

The sky is made of crystal and the land is suspended by four strings.
WALK

Santee says
never say trail of tears

driving the car to the mounds Santee says not to do lots
we are driving on the paved roads that weren’t there going west it wasn’t that cold we went to the out of control mounds

ey were so unkempt
we didn’t know where Mink was we looked so deeply for her

Kim rubbed tobacco
on Turtle and wrapped
a song in Anishinaabemowin around the wind

we remember you, remember us
WALK

bible black sky and fine horns sparkle out from the radio “Give Me Love (Give Me Peace On Earth)”

the rich man meant it inasmuch as he meant his kind of peace

step by step the radio dragging us up next

Redbone playfully thumps

we dance back dancing whirling our strong legs across time
WALK

wind thick legs feet

air

our skin against the weather pushed

the time it was very late and we couldn't the rocks angry against our feet, the men

laughing in their shoes
POEM FROM THE IMAGINED PERSPECTIVE OF OUR TRUMP VOTING COUSIN

Let’s burrow down into the stolen

what you don’t agree they took a lot

they gave us lots

let’s make it more back about

small business
let’s walk

back to the times

before
the government controlled everything

WALK

terminal lesson

ريف

like this?

how to?

how do we?

then? now?

is it okay to?

ηωα
POEM WRITTEN WHILE WATCHING SAW III

the lights
like teeth

so

the always, dying

there's never

a fun one where survivors party

nope

does your alibi hold

to ache
to keep going
WALK

My hair is walking out of my head. I've been walking around the neighborhood thinking about myself mostly entirely. My immediacy I mean. I walk up and down Locust and Burleigh and sometimes I take the bus and walk around Kinnickinnick and when we went to the mounds we parked on something like Mound View drive and we could see the nice houses behind what we thought was Thunderbird. When I am on the phone I walk around the apartment. The heat walks from the heater to keep the apartment unlike the cold outside. The step, the rhythm. I used to love to dance at dance parties, beer and chaos. The television’s noise walks into the space of the room which walks into me, my genetic memory of walking.
WALK

Don’t get me
wrong—I’m implicated

here too, I am
reaping the benefits

from this stolen land. We drive

on the paved streets
where there was grass.
MYTH

We are suspended from four strings.
The temporary suspension of the Treaty of New Echota.
WALK

no no no

out

red blood

dark please

oh the no

knifed faces

nothing

left sighs

heads down

nothing

right

all torn eventually

WALK

south then west
then northwest then

south
the trod bored

men forcing sex upon

the women the pregnant
the yelps crawl

is this my story to tell how can this not

but
neither MORE DRUMS nor REALIZATIONS

it's long and the strongest tiresome. there're fights. we're still talking but it's getting less and less out loud. we stomp and slide. already it's dark and then light again and then already it's dark again. the trees don't understand; we realize this due to continuous peering at the sky through branch after branch, twisting. our ankles get tired. we carry each other when we need to, though sometimes we're prodded and forced to let each other down. we speak jokes still. it's slow but so long and then longer. maybe forever to the home we mostly didn't choose.
EXTRA EXTRA: AN ADDRESS TO US poem in the voice of Elias Boudinot

I was literally stabbed in the back by y’all. I get it,

I do, but, come on, really,
the back? Was my signing of the Treaty of New Echota so stab-worthy? I can see in my still-presence the Phoenix endures, though only in English now, I see. For those who don’t know that’s the newspaper I established, bilingual,

Tsalagi and English in ink side by side like the veins of us mixedbloods.

I’m not mad. I am not as my fathers were,
I said in Philadelphia in 1826 to a kind group of colonizers who allowed me to state my case. This is prelocation, which is a portmanteau of pre- and relocation.

I’m clever with language like that. I get it. I know how to talk to people, how to navigate what so condescendingly is called “civilization.” You know, at least they stabbed Caesar in the front.

I want you to understand I have done all I did—signing, speaking, printing—to further our great Nation (as opposed to their nation).

I have no regrets. My heart and my tongue both keep a deep rhythm.
SEQUOYAH

I’m George Guess, I guess
I’m George Guess, I guess, I guess

ah to make a whole movement of breath

to say what we used to say

but now written down eventually i(t)’ll get put into English like this I’m George now into the English sound we sent the syllabary to Boston to be pressed for the press (wado Elias!)

they couldn’t figure out the arc of $\mathcal{B}$ so $\mathcal{B}$ temporarily became B to B or not to $\mathcal{B}$ that is the question GROCERY STORY

today i went to the grocery store and bought several organic fruits and vegetables so as to keep my health tip top i carried the little blue cherokee card in my wallet there was a good deal on seltzer a song played that reminded me of my ex-wife i paused and cried

by the frozen pizzas then put a frozen pizza into my cart i walked around the store listening to the music looking at the cans and stacks the weird infinite finite nature of the grocery store it was sunny a woman softly crying by the bread

   i am never more alive
   than when i am filling up my cart i walked more and more through ever
-y aisle it came time to put my things on the conveyor belt and have them recorded with a satisfying beep then pull out the small piece of plastic with all my money on it and give it to the nice lady who smiled took my money i didn't need to give it to her i should have just walked out and not paid for anything

she gave me my card
   back reminded me it needed to slide into the computer

which asked a few questions a man put my things into a bag for me i got into my car on the stolen land and on the radio they were discussing the Treaty

of New Echota
WALK

so going, move
downstairs to say hello to Precious and her baby PJ, teething

so going, move
out sunlight

hotter than usual
Santee says

never say trail of tears
leave it buried

in the garden
that Arthur Sze told him about COMFORT

not yet not yet (t)here

cold yet we're all together for a moment we are happy (t)here fire keeps

flame flicks a fleeting warmth that keeps getting darker

ours it is ours
we will be there

we will be here
ours it is ours

44
DO THE RIGHT THING

there's no way it doesn't end

in violence
Was this ball stick (di-la-sga-li-di) held anxiously in some young man’s hands as he struggled to hide their juddering from confident, capable opponents? Or perhaps the other way around—held by a tough and gifted player staring down some weaklings, certain he would handily defeat them and therefore display the strength of his clan. Or, less dramatically, a thoroughly average player, relatively unremarkable, some flashes of athleticism and some sad whiffs, used this item. Is it true a man is only as good as his stick, or what he does with it? While other dilasgaldi feature carvings that might represent the player’s clan or aspects of his personality, the one you’re looking at is clean and smooth, almost generic, which allows the viewer to transplant whatever kind of Cherokee we want onto it—it becomes a palimpsest. Did the player here own slaves or murder for land or betray his fellow Cherokee or members of another group? Did he have relatives pushed west whom he will never see again, or never met in the first place, murdered or raped or tortured on the walk? Some combination? None of the above? The dilasgaldi—used for recreation but also to prove one’s worth and masculinity—becomes a mode of a different kind of play for the viewer, one who is forced to reconcile its sleek beauty with the pure violence of the game itself, and in this way, the stick, which loops and doubles back on itself, becomes a metaphor for the complicated legacy of the Cherokee.
MYTH

Crystal, and Dayunisi swimming down to unearth us here, the trickster finding us
whether we wanted to be found or not, and us inventing our own
quote-unquote discovery.
CREATION
after Jenean Hornbuckle’s painting “Creation,” oil on canvas, NMAI 26.2876

A bit packed
up here,

isn’t it? Let’s make the earth.

The beetle’s body shows the world in ways words can’t.

The water ripples
in ways water can’t.

In the animal’s body
we find ourselves.

In the land, well,

that’s to be decided, ah eh?

There’s a terror in the spread of Dayunisi’s limbs, in his strange face.
If I didn’t know any better, I’d think those contortions were a symbol of fear, or confusion.

He’s moving north, and surrounded (t)here, at the National Museum of the American Indian. We stop to stare at our own making.

It gets lighter as you look up, the blue moving north, too, from dark to light.
RED DEAD REDEMPTIONS

let's get on with it
but what about the past
-John Ashbery, “The Tomb of Stuart Merrill”

Finding others that are just as alone as you are makes navigating the longitudes and latitudes of postcolonial America that much easier to bear.
-Sky Hopinka, “A Dislocated Wild”
THE NATIONAL ANTHEM

Regularly shit gets blown prettily up when whoever’s singing sings the word glare, which is the rocket’s, to punctuate the violence, or defamiliarize it, I’m not sure. Sometimes I go to the grocery store and just walk around when I’m feeling lonely. The rockets and bombs gave proof, the song says:

    violence was our best option, and despite and/or because of the kabooms, the flag remained. I expect people to be there for me all the time but I am terrible at reciprocating, at listening. Outside of Matt and Aly’s Chicago garden apartment the city erected a massive flag that warbles pathetically; it’s too colossal for the soft breezes of the Windy City. Matt hypothesizes it’s so you can see the flag from your car, going east on I-90. If I had any empathy for this broken country, I would hurtle it at this flag, the inadvertent piteousness of itself wrapped around itself, nowhere to go but further inward. On still days, you can’t even really tell what it is other than a mélange of red

    approximating blood and blue approximating sky.
A SEARCHING AND FEARLESS MORAL INVENTORY

Have you ever looked in the mirror and decided that you want to look different?
How would you like to look different?
- “The Bird with Big Feet,” as told by Kathi Littlejohn

My face is inherently leftly slanted which I only notice after looking in the mirror for too long which I haven’t done in a long time but I got a haircut and as it’s only human nature

I looked in the mirror. I hate myself, which means there must be some part of me who does not want to be at war and so simply sits having never understood hate and so simply sits being the small part of the self without hate.

COLONIZATION BROUGHT ME GIN
one of many sonnets

and thus the copious floral splash quick down the throat they can't smell it on you in the morning
i'm told at the bar at 7 am the bar at 7 am is exactly what you think it's like microsoft word wants so bad to uppercase the i and there is no tsalagi keyboard boudinot where you at i'll never understand how else to assimilate so readily

i watched all eight seasons of american horror story

i hate gin but in a pinch will i i do not want to be ah eh what if gin was never
IT HAS TO GO SOMEWHERE

epithalamium for l&d

my computer is dying, my friends are getting sucked into a vortex, the cats are perpendicular, the heat is on. lindsay and daniel got married tonight and everyone was talking about love, it was like we were smoking cigarettes made of love and exhaling love into the air. chris twirled me to remind me what it's like to publicly love. so much of life is just waiting through the commercials. the royals are winning tonight because the mariners played poorly. the cats often eat their food so quick they throw it back up which is a form of love too:

sometimes you take in too much and it has to go somewhere so it goes on the floor which covers the earth to keep our feet clean!
ECHOLOCATIONS

after Gerald Vizenor, with a line from Shakira

As I nametag through life on took land
I send out echolocations of confusion and gratitude to anything that can receive it

de the big ladder
de the little ditch de

cellular formations
made from shifting satellites named after the children of the wealthy for birthday presents chairs made for sitting unsat in clouds move if you look or not de there will be a point de at which boxes will hold every dy thing you own some frog hops into a pond and if you’re some combination of good lucky dead you’ve got one hell of a poem underneath your clothes there’s an endless story the little ladder de the big ditch

whichever you think is better is better BALLGAME

Where did the time go? The Royals game’s already in the seventh inning, what happened? What happened in the fourth? Who led off? Why’d we mark error on the scorecard? How are we still alive? What’s really bringing us all together here? Is it bad I want you to tell me? Why is the bathroom so fun? Who died during this game, and how? Who cared and who cares? Why did I spend so much of my life asking so what, and so what? Why am I still here? We won the big one four years ago; why are we so bad now? What’s happening? How many keys to how many doors? How many records get bought then never get played? Why do we get tired in the middle of our day? Should we just go to sleep? It’s already the seventh? Why the cheekboned faces on the illustration of displaced Cherokee on the National Park Service’s Trail of Tears Association Trail of Tears National Historic Trail website? Why’d I download the .jpeg? Why can’t I stop staring at them, their just-red-enough-skin sadness poking through my greasy MacBook screen? Where are the Black folks in this picture? We had slaves, right? We had slaves? The Royals are down 5-1 in the top of the eighth, now, they don’t have a chance, right?
VISITING THE MILWAUKEE PUBLIC MUSEUM WITH SHANAE

The butterflies just land on your hand there, if you place your fingers just so on a leaf in front of them. Who’m I to judge a butterfly’s happiness? The powwow exhibition is stuck, it doesn’t rotate like it should, but there is an American flag and a cooler and a bored kid looking scrawny in an ill-fitting T-shirt and an old laptop, so I guess they got some things right.

They got some things right:
we are still alive, they point out on occasion, but generally we don’t look like how we look in a museum. That’s what a new famous book by a newly famous Indian author talks about at the beginning, or at least that’s what I heard on NPR. Shanae crinkles her nose when I mention I’m reading the book and we talk at the bar about toxic masculinity and she’s right,

as most always. I don’t read much of the placards, just gallop through the stuffy halls that portend to hold us, whatever small history. Shanae pauses to read most everything. We come away talking about how unlike the real the depictions were, how we felt like we were walking through a big National Geographic magazine, the pain of ossification, and on the first floor

before we got up to the second floor Indian exhibit we stared at two dinosaurs, one devouring the other’s innards, and I made some joke about colonialism and looked over at Shanae to see if she laughed—I love her laugh—and caught her nodding, her eyes fixated somewhere back before.
SEEING RED

No need to try to understand the man wearing the dumb inexact idea-of-an-Indian avatar, the cartoon of us. We already understand him, we trudged

through land and language for him.
    In theory, he can only take so much, yet here he is taking ourselves away

as he chomps on eggs made by Latinx dudes and served by white folks

(in this I am also complicit). We know we will continue complicitly moving through the four-cornered world but if I see that motherfucker wearing that insignia again

    I will knock his ass down where even Dayunisi can't find him.
WALK
for Angela

During a commercial during Thursday Night Football
I read a Yona Harvey poem Soham gave me that makes me cry and consider how I don’t use metaphor much, like she says a coat is a door and I never say anything is anything other than what it is and yeah of course a coat is a door and vice versa and her poem is so meticulous in its loneliness; it’s so beautiful and careful and I’m crying now which is not a metaphor for anything except my body, which Angela and I talked about (more generally as one of many many bodies)

over good gravy at The Nicollet Diner and Angela—whose house I slept in which come to think of it is incredibly intimate, and who piloted her big truck with us in it all over Minneapolis, narrating the city and driving me slowly past First Avenue so I could cry softly there at seeing the ghost of Prince through her window and time—asked what makes a body and she meant it
and it was such a beautiful moment with florescence hovering and I’m so lucky to be surrounded by people that are still alive!
SESTINA: AMERICAN CHEROKEE

Hey, there is a lot of food in my pantry. I’m not proud of it. I don’t eat it that often: I tend to go out instead, maybe catch the football game or the baseball game, depending on what’s on. Sometimes

I can’t finish all my food and I think maybe I should give my leftovers away to someone,

anyone. Would that make you proud? To know I think that without prodding? Well, not often, of course. I’d say one out of ten times

I have an impulse to give.
Would my ancestors be not proud of me

for I don’t know no
or maybe I did know no

and forgot its oomph, or don’t have much use for no anymore.

There may be an occasion in which karma’s boomerang smacks me
whatever it’s made of ten little Indians all killing each other and/or themselves

I’m proud to be Cherokee

(minus that bullshit about our disposition towards booze and basketball though I love booze and basketball).

I rarely eat the Three Sister foods I’d rather eat out than cook if I were to guess what that’s all about it must be that I like being waited on,
not just when food
is involved.

Genetic wish for oneupsmanship fulfilled often I think I should have been born bigger and stronger so I could have been a baseball player. Hey are you proud to be an American James 4:6: God opposes the proud, but gives grace to the humble. Football players never point at the sky after they screw up a play. Maybe they should how often do you point at the sky do you do it before you eat your food hey does it end this way hey is there anything else hey maybe it ends frequent and never like a basketball game in infinite overtimes a game you can’t get thrown out of at least there’s food if you forget hard enough there’s so much about which to be proud.
MYTH

_in which the last word is everything_

The darkness is like small animals crawling on top of each other as we pile into Jimmy's rusted '77 Reliant K to go shoplift some vodka to fill our sixteen-year-old minds with anything other than ourselves.

The four of us walk in the grocery store all smiles. We make a point to buy some toilet paper; not enough to attract attention

(an aside:
once we were detained at Wal-Mart while security asked why we needed 200 rolls and Jimmy said he had diarrhea and we laughed through the cops' sighs and eventually they let us go and said they'd get us good one day and after we yeah righted all over town)

but anyway
we get enough TP to warrant our backpacked presence in the grocery store and a good start on what we'll need to TP another Jimmy's house later.
Alan elbows a jar of spaghetti sauce onto the ground around the time Quentin rolls out, stuffed blue backpack with three Smirnoff handles clanking and there's a chaos
and somehow they know
and some underpaid manager chases after us and we jump laughing into Jimmy's running car and speed off
and for real a cop
follows us for a few blocks so we take a quick left-right-left and turn into the Sarah-that-Jimmy-lost-his-virginity-to's garage to hang out for a bit while we wait for it all to blow over; plus Sarah's brother is a dealer so we can smoke a lot in the little box of moonlight their garage provides and her parents, good hard-working Italian folk, second-generation Americans, always have snacks.

Later I will throw up under a streetlight, then even more later after Alan gets a blowjob from Jenny (with whom Jimmy is in love)
we go out to the other Jimmy's house in the fancy suburbs and let the TP fly: 72 rolls’ worth floating through the sky like how some clouds look like birds.
When we’re done, we know
we’ve done something right, we’ve shown the world how much we matter.
For the next couple days,
you can see our work from 169-South, the highway that pushes us down back from the nicer houses
into our parents’ cramped apartments, the whites of the TP from the trees swaying like surrender flags, like all the stuff surrounding the part of the eye that sees which some teachers must’ve tried to teach us the word for in vain they tried to teach us while we were too busy plotting how to get away with/from everything.

THE NEXT

in public with my earbuds

in i was in a movie a music

video sometimes i mouth

the words to an imagined camera which remains always a few paces ahead

taking a tracking shot of me i do a lot

i go to the grocery store even when I still have food

i can eat i get

it anyway i get

cans of water on sale, chicken, salad mix in a plastic bag, frozen pizzas, all-natural juice

i get cans of soup on clearance that don't expire for the longest

so i can eat them

later i like
later i like when it's next i like the next WON'T GET FooLED AGAIN

with a line from Bill Olsen

Having emptied as much out of the world as I can stand, I slump inwards, selfish genes, a not taken-down

Christmas tree, a woman's snores a room over rendered inaudible, I'm so lonesome

every day the Everly Brothers sing in fluffed tandem effectively defeating their own argument, two people lonesome together, cold across America, -25° wind chill or thereabouts outside, the community meeting at All People's Church on Clarke postponed til next week ok with me, I don't trust systems of power I can't control, they're knocking on the latenite doors of protest organizers, waking their mothers, all hours, the squirrels living in the gutters are getting louder, maybe they're laughing, bad earth, the Thunder lost to Cleveland, LeBron got hot in the fourth and nailed back-to-back-threes that hollowed Morrow then a nasty pull-up long-two fade,

I don't want flashlights probing my closed eyelids, they remembered me that time I was drunk and spit and called them pigs and they took me to a side alley and put me in the back of the car threatening to take me down to District 5, the implication when I got there I'd be out of place, different from the rounded-up others, I would be safer on the outside, the implication they were saving me from myself, little snowflakes like halos, nothing seems to be the same old way the Everly Brothers continue, one of the cats tips the water bowl so the water ripples before she drinks it, must be some genetic memory, so frothy at this forever tipping point, elsewhere big murder, detonated schoolbus in Kabul, Lindsey Lohan posts a selfie people realize is photoshopped cause there’s a small bottle of soap that looks bent inwards near her stomach, I hate how I feel when I say America, paranoia avalanche, the cops in Milwaukee have frightened me and I don’t have it nearly as bad as those west of Holton continuously fucked with, I look white, I am more white than Tsalagi, the baby downstairs crying, I was telling Lauren at Sugar Maple how all this must criss-cross, my cats clean themselves, I am white, I am not white, didaniyisgi, policeman, translation: “he argues repeatedly and on purpose with a purpose,” in Cherokee the object

proceeds the verb
but is still after the subject, lots of us swept from southeast to Oklahoma mostly, who would ever become police or politician, Sitting Bull killed by Red Tomahawk officer of Indian Police, I’m scared to walk on ice, I wish I was in a cool rock and roll band with Ephraim and Soham where I just talked over squawkling guitars, all this used to be grass, the want to build up, to now conquer sky, *I have been trying to walk out of this body my whole life, how can the Everly

Brothers fade out like that if they’re together, I know

it’s gotta be tough to not look white like me
ECHOLOCATIONS PART II
for Dig Reeder

I WAS NOT DEAD Sarah bellows underneath the little dipper to some of us disrupting the quiet dark

tomorrow, a big void
where nothing matters

America Xeroxes
itself nicely

our empty clothes sprawled like fingers, having known so much skin
HAVE MERCY

I've gotten a lot of mileage out
of the luxuries of slaughter. I swerved to hit
a collapsed bird
on the road today;
I'm not sure if it
was already dead
or not, but it certainly couldn't fly. It was a puddle of a bird.

Meanwhile, several police officers stood outside an indoor soccer field staring off into the distance
with their guns pointed at a coyote. One of them shot at it but it didn't move; the damn thing was frozen. They shot
more at it. It continued to wag its tail mockingly.

I don't know much about my family history (I'm learning), but I have a little blue card I carry that says I'm Cherokee so I often feel displaced.

Eventually the youngest of the gathered officers got sent over to the animal and discovered it was a scarecrow
with a couple of bullet holes in its ass. Today

the news said
that fifty terrorist attacks were prevented through the surveillance of hundreds of thousands of Americans, which I saw careening across a screen displaying the news in a restaurant while I was eating

lunch. Today’s Featured Picture on Wikipedia is an Albatross. I admire

the brazen irony
of secrets. A few of the officers

had missed and put thumb-sized holes in the dirt, so

there were ants scurrying about confusedly, which come to think of it is pretty much how ants always seem to get around.

I bet

they have a better plan than they get credit for.
We’ve all got a little torture in our blood, but it’s a matter of what side our ancestors were on.

Mine are on both.
I never got any money from the government for being Cherokee
but that's the first thing people ask me
when they find out.
It was so cold
in the airconditioned restaurant that I felt uncomfortable, but then it was so hot outside that I didn't want to be there, either. Most of us have mercy every now and again!
I don't look Cherokee, except maybe
the nose a bit.
I don't look like
much of anything.
I can't remember the last time I looked in the mirror. I hate having my picture taken.
THE EASE AND DIFFICULTY OF HATING AND LOVING ONE’S SELF

a fly bonks itself against a screen, seeing the trees not able to get to them generally not getting it feeling morose today and divided the mixedblood sleeps

alone on a twin mattress
i can’t find Santee’s book, too bad

i’ve been thinking about it i’ve been driving around without my driver’s license got refused service for trying to use

my tribal ID at a bar dust thickens on the tops of things

there’s some scene in some movie where some character says i have so much to give pleadingly

i can’t remember the context as far as i can think the fly is going to do a combination of the following die in my apartment and/or propagate in my apartment and/or leave my apartment

then die and/or propagate the mixedblood feeling morose today wishing

I had some gin or something maybe some pills maybe instead of morose I mean vulnerable not sure what the difference is or if they inform each other

if they talk to each other the way the fly talks to the screen as it yearns to talk to the trees ANOTHER DRUNK INDIAN POEM

elegy for Adrian C. Louis

The flaws in my veins course more heavily as I shake again. The ritual of opening the bottle, pouring, the soft burn of the liquor that got cheaper and cheaper as the bottle emptied itself faster and faster. I wish I could blame the bottle or even the stuff inside of it,

or the rain or really anything other than myself. Some hereditary predilection—I think of my father’s veins, how green they looked against his toasted skin, how years later I told a doctor about those veins and the doctor said he was just dehydrated. Dad said he quit drinking and then the other day

he calls me with an unmistakable slur, a glitteriness. At a certain point, you come to expect the overwhelming solitude of guilt, and turn back to the fog of booze to get over it.

I prefer to drink alone;

there’s less of a chance of saying something I regret, though I love to dance, that open freedom of not caring what you’re saying to whom, the ways

a party becomes a mass of faces each with their own resolute absence of potential for much of anything beyond whatever you want them to provide in that moment. It’s the closest to an ocean a group of people can get,

and me, there, somewhere in the vortex, smiling like an island.
I HAVE THINGS THAT HAPPENED IN MY LIFE THAT THERE IS NO RECORD OF

Violins squealing tinny from the computer (my computer a robot constructed by other robots constructed by other robots constructed by humans constructed by humans) my mother purchased for me: decrease in sound! How much can I get away with until I get what’s coming to me? Let me F11 you down into nothingness. My student says she doesn’t like how I don’t make them raise their hands before they speak. I say I don’t believe in making them feel like I know who says what is best, like cause I point at someone and say YOU that makes them more right, more listenable.

Brian Wilson stopped working with the other Beach Boys to the point where the group almost split up and most people think Pet Sounds—the record that came out right before they got into their biggest fights—is their best but I really like the four or five records that came out after that one for their playfulness. Anyway, obedience
is the name of the game.

  I don’t say no
to much. I, I, I, I, I: all the time when younger. Who do you think you are, the radio thumps at me, and Jean Knight makes a convincing point when she croons you’re never gonna get my love. I’ve been caught shoplifting; arrested for public drunkenness; taken citations for partying too loud and not stopping after a warning; thrown up upon so many shoes; accidentally cut I don't know how many people's feet with glass from wine jugs, beer bottles, fifths of rye I carelessly smashed; run away from different cops (inasmuch as there are different cops) after they shined a flashlight on me and John pissing
    in an alleyway with stolen whiskey and Cokes in our hands. I want to obey, I only have at most two drinks before I drive anymore, I say hello, officer and smile.

Brian Wilson strove to write a pocket symphony. War Machine, the UFC fighter, beat up his ex, Christy Mack, real bad a lot then tried to kill himself
    I understand the latter but not the former; I can’t obey the drawbacks of my bad life; I look at my unslit wrists out of sweet habit. I was full at breakfast and now I'm hungry

again.

I favor music with vertiginous guitars. Last night I had to turn down the Condo Fucks record because my downstairs neighbors have an easily agitated baby but all I want to do is make it louder, always.

I've thrown up from disobeying my body’s orders so much, but not for a long time now. I remember once I threw up on a tree then huffed a bunch of ether then watched Quamar play Fallout for a couple hours. I use my credit card too much. Who makes my shoes?

In fact I had a beer earlier today even though I promised myself I wouldn’t. I have things that happened in my life that there is no record of, says the ex-wife of an NFL player when asked if she experienced domestic abuse, why she and many other wives didn’t come forward, how scared they were to. I don’t believe in any magical or spiritual force holding earth together, but then I look out the window at the tops of red trees poking their way
above my neighbors' vertiginous roof and below a pile

of dishes ruins the view

I'll wait

as long as I can, and I don't know why

I wait to do them, I like hot water and soap and warm clean smell but I don't like to do, you know? Led Zeppelin stole the riff
from "Stairway to Heaven" from the band Spirit, who are best known for their one-hit wonder tune "I Got A Line On You," a classic AM radio rocker.

All this is why
I like
so much to imagine being dead: to obey
the natural order of doing so much and then
not anything
again but of course for now I am still standing, unless you subscribe to that philosophical view that only that which you can see exists.
GOODBYE
for sam

hear me out
please

thing of it

it's long and wrong

god our feet

i don't want to speak

on your behalf

mine are tired

i don't want to speak

hear me out

the whole

god our feet

i'm a product
of dignity and ambition

i fall in love
so easily

i walk towards the heart i want

my body
to evaporate i have many bodies mine are tired FRANKLIN K.R. CLINE

EDUCATION
PhD, English—Creative Writing, University of Milwaukee-Wisconsin, Milwaukee, WI May 2019
Master of Fine Arts in Creative Writing, Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo, MI April 2014
Master of Arts in Literature, Truman State University, Kirksville, MO May 2011 Bachelor of Arts, Truman State University, Kirksville, MO July 2009
Majors: English (emphasis in criticism and composition) and Philosophy & Religion

AWARDS
- Distinguished Dissertation Fellowship, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2018-present
- Advanced Opportunity Fellowship, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2015-2018
- Graduate Teaching Assistantship, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2014-2016
- University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee American Indian Student Services Student Success Recognition Award, Fall 2014-Fall 2016
- Western Michigan University All-University Graduate Teaching Effectiveness Award, 2014
- Graduate Teaching Assistantship, Western Michigan University, 2011-2014
- Gwen Frostic Fellowship, Western Michigan University, 2011
- Graduate Teaching Assistantship, Truman State University, 2010-2011

CREATIVE AND ACADEMIC PUBLICATIONS
(An explanation: each poem in my full-length book of poetry, So What, is entitled “So What”—each “So What” in this list is a different poem!)
- Y Que (Spanish translation of So What). forthcoming from Vegetarian Alcoholic Press
- “Ballgame,” “Sestina Written After I Call My Mother.” Yellow Medicine Review, forthcoming
- “Walk.” Dreginald, forthcoming
- “The Ease and Difficulty of Hating and Loving One’s Self.” Science-Based Vulnerability: Scientists and Poets Resist, forthcoming
- “Looking West on 26th and Emerson.” Ouroboros, forthcoming
- “Review of Carnivalia.” Georgia Review, forthcoming
- “Eat.” Eat Local Read Local, April 2019
- “Give Me Shelter.” The Politics of Shelter, Brackish Daughters Publishing, 2018
- “And.” Outlook Springs, Issue 5
- “Sonnet: To Eat, To Fall In Love.” Eat Local / Read Local, 2018
- “So What”; “So What.” Forklift, Ohio. Issue 35-36
- “So What”; “So What”; “So What.” Red Ink, Issue 19.2
- “Sonnet: The Spider and the Fly.” Eat Local / Read Local, 2017
• “No Escapin’ This”; “So What.” Resist Much / Obey Little. Dispatches Editions, 2017
• “Review of LetERRs.” Wasafiri Magazine, Issue 91
• “Review of Conflict Resolution for Holy Beings.” Studies in American Indian Literature, Volume 28.3 • “Domicile.” Cleaver Magazine, Issue 10
• “Ours Poetica.” Modern Poetry Quarterly Review, Issue 3
• “Chainsaw Miniatures.” Oyez Review, Issue 38
• “Pistons +6,” Eat Local / Read Local. 2015
• “Rob Van Dam Versus John Cena For The WWE Championship,” Word Riot, Issue 9
• “Party in the U.S.A.,” Banango Street, Issue 8
• “In Which An Old Dusty Springfield Song Comes Along.” Literary Juice, Issue 8
• “Sammy the Poet” (published under different name), “Whatever It Is A Dead Thing Might Do,” “Professional Wrestling” (published under different name). B O D Y
• “Keith Calls Me To Speak Of Relationships.” Rabbit Catastrophe Review, Issue 7
• “Nature Poem” (published under different name). Cheat River Review, Issue 1
• “Trigger Warning.” Beecher’s, Issue 3
• “Interview with Glenn Shaheen.” The Wide Net, Issue 1
• “Slur Oeuvre: A Review.” Third Coast, Spring 2013

READINGS AND CONFERENCES
• Workshop leader, AllWriters Workshop at the University of Wisconsin-Waukesha, “Storytelling and Empathy in the Age of Loneliness,” 5/25/19
• Poetry reading, Travelling Molloy’s Reading Series at Buzz Café, Chicago, 4/8/19
• Poetry reading, V.A. Goes West, Portland, OR, 3/29/19
• Panel presentation, “The Lifeblood of Regional Literary Celebrations,” Association of Writers and Writing Programs Conference, 3/29/19
• Poetry reading and Q&A, Syracuse University, 2/19/19
• Poetry reading, Sunday Stories Reading Series, Var Gallery, Milwaukee, 12/16/18
• Poetry reading and Q&A, Southeast Wisconsin Festival of Books, University of Wisconsin-Waukesha, 11/4/18
• Poetry reading, United We Read, Public House Cooperative, Milwaukee, 10/18/18
• Poetry reading, LitFam Reading Series, Sugar Maple Tavern, Milwaukee, 10/17/18
• Poetry reading, “Featured Poets of Milwaukee,” St. John’s on the Lake, Milwaukee, 4/23/18
• Presentation, “Who’s Laughing Now?: Indian Humor Despite It All,” North Dakota State University, 4/6/18
• Poetry reading, Uncharted Books, Chicago, IL, 3/16/18
• Poetry reading and Q&A, Carthage College Instructor Spotlight, Carthage College, Kenosha, WI, 3/27/18
• Poetry reading. Poetry Night at the Jazz Estate, Milwaukee, 2/26/18
• Poetry reading. “Walk,” Midwest Interdisciplinary Graduate Conference: Asymmetry, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2/16/18
• Poetry reading. Kismet Bookstore, St. Louis, MO, 1/25/18
• Poetry reading and Q&A, Westminster College, Fulton, MO, 1/24/18
• Poetry reading. Taproom Poetry Series, Lawrence, KS, 1/21/18
• Poetry reading. Bookmarx Bookstore, Springfield, MO, 1/20/18
• Poetry reading. Steel’s Used Books, Kansas City, MO, 1/19/18
• Poetry reading. Wolverine Farms, Fort Collins, CO, 1/18/18
• Poetry reading. Jazzyr Poetry Reading Series, Boulder, CO, 1/17/18
• Poetry reading. Rediscovered Books, Boise, ID, 1/14/18
• Poetry reading. The Store, Portland, OR, 1/13/18
• Poetry reading. Bellingham Alternative Library, Bellingham, WA, 1/11/18
• Poetry reading. Café deux Soliel, Vancouver, BC, 1/10/18
• Poetry reading. Vermillion Art Gallery, Seattle, WA, 1/9/18
• Poetry reading. Outer Space Collective, Arcata, CA, 1/8/18
• Poetry reading. Old Capitol Books, Monterrey, CA, 1/7/18
• Poetry reading. Octopus Literary Salon, Oakland, CA, 1/6/18
• Poetry reading. “Franklin K.R. Cline and Santee Frasier sponsored by the Poetry Coalition and Milwaukee Native American Literary Cooperative,” Woodland Pattern Book Center, Milwaukee, 11/19/17
• Poetry reading. Wolf House, Minneapolis, 11/15/17
• Poetry reading. Volumes Bookstore, Chicago, 10/26/17
• Poetry reading. Return to the Gathering Place of the Waters Book Release, Public House Cooperative, Milwaukee, 5/25/17
• Poetry reading. BONK! #104, Racine, 5/20/17
• Panel presentation, “Milwaukee’s Poetry of Resistance,” Untitledtown Book and Author Festival, Green Bay, 4/30/2017
• Poetry reading and performance art alongside Maplewood Gardens, “Poets Read Some Stuff Somewhere In Milwaukee,” Var Gallery and Studio, Milwaukee, 3/30/17
• Poetry reading. “Because We Come From Everything: Poetry and Migration,” Woodland Pattern Book Center, 3/28/17
• Presentation. “‘I Am Contingent’”: Words and Resonances in Craig Santos Perez’s from unincorporated territory..., Words Matter: Politics, Rhetoric, and Social Justice Conference, Indiana University, 3/25/17
• Poetry reading. “CIASOM,” Midwest Interdisciplinary Graduate Conference: MOSAIC, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2/17/17
• Poetry reading and craft talk, “American Cherokee,” Landbody: Indigeneity’s Radical Commitments Conference, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 5/6/16
• Presentation. ‘When It Gets This Big, It’s Hard To Tell What You Have The Most Of”: Lotería Cards and Katamari Damacy, Radical Writes Conference, Southeast Missouri State University, 4/16/16
• Poetry reading, “Check Engine,” Midwest Interdisciplinary Graduate Conference: Unbearable, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, 2/20/16
• Poetry reading, Poetry in the Park: Native American Poetry Spotlight, Milwaukee, 11/15/15
• Poetry reading, “Triangles, Squares, Rich Folks” antigenre work alongside Frankie Mastrangelo, Midwest Interdisciplinary Graduate Conference: Unbearable, 2/10/15
• Panel presentation, “Checking The Box Score: Sports And Literature,” Western Michigan University Sigma Tau Delta Annual English Studies Conference, 3/6/13

TEACHING EXPERIENCE
• Lecturer, Carthage College Department of English, January 2017-December 2018
  o Classes taught: Introduction to Creative Writing, ENG 2050 (4 sections) • Instructor, Woodland Pattern Book Center Summer Poetry Camp, June 2016-present o Classes taught: two week-long poetry workshops to students from grades 4-11 • Teaching Assistant, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, August 2014-December 2016
  o Classes taught: Introduction to College Writing, ENG 101 (5 sections); Introduction to Creative Writing, ENG 233 (2 sections)
• Assistant Director of First Year Composition, Western Michigan University, August 2012-May 2014
• Teaching Assistant, Western Michigan University, August 2011-August 2012
  o Taught Introduction to Composition, ENG 101 (3 sections) • Teaching Assistant, Truman State University, 2010-2011
  o Classes taught: Writing as Critical Thinking, ENG 1050 (1 section); Introduction to Creative Writing, ENG 2200 (1 section)

ADMINISTRATIVE POSITIONS AND SERVICE
• Member, Woodland Pattern Book Center Board of Directors, July 2015-present
• Co-coordinator, Juneau Park Friends Poetry in the Park, December 2015-present
• Food & Drink Correspondent, Shepard Express, July 2015-present
• Officer, Word Warriors (Indigenous Literature And Culture Student Organization At UWM), September 2016-May 2019
• Co-curator, Short Shots 9 Poetry Reading, May 2019
• Book Reviews and Interviews Editor, cream city review. August 2015-April 2019
• Volunteer poetry instructor, American Civil Liberties Union Youth Social Justice Forum, October 2017 and October 2018
• Graduate representative, UWM Department of English Graduate Policy Committee, May 2015-September 2018
• Guest poetry instructor, Indian Community School, March 2018
• Member, Woodland Pattern Book Center Executive Director Search Committee, March 2017-Feb 2018
• Assistant Poetry Editor, cream city review, September 2014-September 2015
• Book Reviews and Interviews Editor, Third Coast, September 2012-May 2014
• President, Association of Graduate English Students at Western Michigan University, April 2012-July 2014
• Assistant Editor, New Issues Press, September 2011-May 2014
• Assistant Poetry Editor, Third Coast, September 2011-September 2012